K. GEORGE III.

THE unfortunate disputes with the American Colonies, revived by the imposition of the Port duties in 1767, had fince that fatal period fuffered no interruption or abatement, though very much kept out of fight by those vehement domestic contests in which the English Nation selt itself for the time more nearly interested, though of far less real and lasting importance. A general retrospective view of Colonial politics will be neceffary, to illustrate and introduce the momentous transactions of the succeeding years. In the Act imposing the port duties on paper, glass, colors, teas, &c. passed A. D. 1767, was a remarkable clause, which gave scarcely less umbrage and alarm than the taxes themselves; empowering the Crown by fign manual to establish a general CIVIL LIST throughout every province in America, to an indefinite extent, with any falaries, places, or appointments, to the very last shilling of the American VOL. II. revenue, revenue. The Act indeed provided, that after all fuch ministerial warrants under the fign manual as are thought proper and necessary shall be fatiffied, the residue of the revenue shall be at the dispofal of Parliament. "But who, it was asked, can fuppose such warrants will ever be satisfied till Minifters have provided for all their friends and favorites? This-mockery of an American revenue proves at last, said a Member of the House (Mr. Hartley), to be only the crumbs that fall from the Minister's table—the RESIDUE of a royal warrant counterfigned by the First Lord of the Treasury!" The next step in the progress of the new system of American taxation, was the establishment of an American Board of Commissioners, which, under the auspices of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Charles Townshend, passed into an Act the fame fession. This Board was fixed at Boston, where the Commissioners arrived in the autumn of that year.

The non-importation agreement entered into by the Colonies, in consequence of the rash and unadvised measures adopted by England, have been already noticed; but though they confined their practical apposition to their commercial combinations, they now began to indulge a boundless and dangerous licence of speculative discussion on the nature and extent of parliamentary power. Till this period they had, with a cheerfulness which precluded cluded any deep or accurate investigation of right, admitted the exercise of a discretionary legislative authority in the Parliament of Great Britain. They had admitted the diffinction between raifing money as the mere incidental produce of regulating duties, and for the direct purpose of revenue; but now they argued more boldly, and as speculatifts more confiftently, in faying, that if the Parliament of Great Britain has no right to tax us internally, they have none to tax us externally; and if they have no right to tax us without our confent, they can have none to govern or to legislate for us without our confent. These reasonings, so natural and obvious in prefent circumstances, when the power of the Mother Country was, in the apprehenfion of every American, employed to the purposes of oppression, prove in a striking manner the unexampled folly of Great Britain, in rifquing the discussion of a right so problematic and precarious. The only just and folid basis of the authority of Great Britain over the Colonies, was that of common utility fanctioned by long prescription and universal acquiescence. But when the authority of Great Britain was exerted for her own separate advantage, in a manner unauthorized by custom, and unacknowledged by those over whom it was exercifed by mere dint of superior force, it could in nothing be diffinguished from tyranny, to which refistance and revolt only can be properly opposed.

To attempt to govern a whole nation in a mode abhorrent from their feelings, principles, and prejudices, is a complication of folly and wickedness; and the counsels of Great Britain at this period were governed by a spirit of infatuation, which it is difficult to analyse into any of the common principles of human action, and which excites our astonishment at least as strongly as our indignation or regret.

In January 1768, the Affembly of Maffachusetts Bay transmitted, by their Speaker, a circular letter to the different Colonies, in which they recommend to the respective Colonial Legislatures to take into joint confideration the measures it may be proper to adopt for the redress of their common grievances, particularly specifying the late Acts imposing duties and taxes on America, and expressing their firm confidence in the King, their common headand father, that the united and dutiful fupplications of his diffressed American subjects will meet with his royal and favorable acceptance. No fooner was this known in England, than Lord Hillfborough transmitted instructions to Governor Bernard, in his Majesty's name, so soon as the General Court is again affembled, to require of the House of Representatives "to RESCIND the resolution which gave birth to the circular letter from the Speaker, and to declare their disapprobation of, and diffent from, that rash and hasty proceeding-at the same time time strangely affirming the resolution in question to be unfair, contrary to the real fense of the Affembly, and procured by furprife;" although it in fact paffed almost unanimously in a very full House, after the most ample and deliberate discussion. case of the refusal of the House to comply with this requisition, the Governor was commanded immediately to diffolve the Affembly, and to transmit to his Lordship an account of their transactions. This imperious demand was conceived precifely in the spirit of a mandate of the French King to his Parliaments, but fortunately it could not be enforced by lettres de cachet. If French Parliaments have been known resolutely to resist the will of the despot with the terrors of imprisonment, exile, and death before their eyes, it will eafily be supposed that an Affembly of men boafting their descent from ancestors whose garments were stained in the blood of tyrants, were little likely to yield this abject fubmission. A Committee of the House reported a letter to Lord Hillfborough, in which the egregious misapprehension of his Lordship, with regard to the mode in which the resolution had passed the House, was corrected; and the House then agreed on a message to the Governor, in which they faid-"It is to us incomprehenfible that we should be required, on the peril of a dissolution of the General Court, to rescind a resolution of a former House, when it is evident that that : resolution has no existence but as a mere historical fact. Your Excellency must know that the resolution is, to fpeak the language of the common law, not now executory, but to all intents and purpofes executed. If, as is most probable, by the word rescinding is intended the passing a vote in direct and express disapprobation of the measure of the former House, we must take the liberty to testify, and publicly to declare, that we take it to be the native, inherent, and indefeafible right of the fubject jointly or feverally to petition the King for the redrefs of grievances. If the votes of the House are to be controlled by the directions of a Minister, we have left us but a vain femblance of liberty. We have now only to inform you, that this House have voted NOT to RESCIND; and that on the division on the question, there were ninety-two yeas, and feventeen nays." The next day the Governor diffolved the Affembly." In the course of the debate which preceded this refolution, a Member of the Affembly faid, "When Lord Hillsborough knows that we will not refeind our Acts, he should apply to Parliament to reseind theirs. Let Britain refeind her measures, or she will lose America for ever."

At the fame time that Lord Hillsborough transmitted his Majesty's high commands to Sir Francis Bernard, he wrote a circular letter to the Governors of the different Provinces, in which, referring to the letter of the Massachusetts Aslembly, his Lordship said, "It is his Majesty's PLEASURE that you fhould, immediately on the receipt hereof, exert your utmost influence to defeat this flagitious attempt to disturb the public peace, by prevailing upon the Affembly of the Province to take no notice of it, which will be treating it with the contempt it deserves." The contempt of the Americans was referred however for the letter of his Lordship; the Assemblies throughout the Continent highly applauding the conduct of the Maffachufetts, and almost unanimously passing votes and refolves according with the spirit of the letter received from Boston. The Assembly of New York in particular, whose principles were supposed most favorable to loyalty, answered it in the most respectful terms, and appointed a Committee of Correspondence to confult with the other Colonies on the measures to be pursued in the present crisis; upon which that Affembly also was dissolved. Orders also were transmitted by Lord Hillsborough to Governor Penn, to diffolve the Affembly of Pennfylvania; his Lordship, by a pleasant mistake, not recollecting it to be the established and chartered privilege of that House to fit on their own adjournments, and that the Governor had no power to diffolve them.

In the midft of the ferment occasioned by these proceedings, a floop, called the Liberty, laden with B4 wine, wine from Madeira, was feized under authority of the Commissioners of the Customs for a false entry; and being cut by force from her moorings, was by their order removed under the guns of the Romney, a ship of war lying in the harbour of Boston. The minds of the populace being greatly inflamed, a violent riot enfued, in which the houses of the Commissioners were assailed, their persons grossly infulted, and they were compelled to take refuge at first on board the Romney, and afterwards at the fortress adjacent to the town, called Castle William. It being now thought necessary by Government, which disdained every idea of concession or retractation, to fration a confiderable military and naval force at the town of Boston, orders were issued for that purpose, and also for repairing the fortress of Caftle William. On receiving this intelligence, a meeting of the principal inhabitants of Boston was called, and an address presented by them to the Governor, praying him in the most urgent terms to iffue precepts forthwith for convening a General Affembly; but this his Excellency declared he could not do without receiving his Majesty's commands. The legality of the meeting also was peremptorily denied by the Governor, who declared the conveners of it to be guilty of an high offence, admonifhing them to confider the penalties they were incurring by continuing their fession; and he protested that, if they did not attend to this warning, he must affert the prerogative of the Crown in a more public manner; adding, in a tone of menace, "that they may affure themselves, for he spoke from INSTRUCTION, that the KING was determined to maintain his ENTIRE SOVEREIGNTY over that Province; and whoever should persist in usurping any of the rights of it would REPENT his But the Governor feemed not to re-BASHNESS." collect, that those who usurp the RIGHTS of the People may be made to REPENT their RASHNESS, as well as those who invade the PREROGATIVE of the Sovereign. A number of votes expressive of the agitation of the public mind were unanimoufly passed, and amongst them is a resolve, that those inhabitants who are not provided with arms be requested to furnish themselves forthwith. On the first of October 1768, the troops landed under cover of a confiderable fleet, confifting of fourteen ships of war of different descriptions, lying in the harbor of Boston, with their broadfides to the town; and marching into this metropolis with bayonets fixed, drums beating, and colors flying, with a train of artillery accompanying them, the imagination of the inhabitants was impreffed with all the ideas affociated with the infolence of conquest, and the horrors of military despotism.

In the enfuing month of February (1769) a joint Address was moved and presented by both Houses of Parliament to the King, expressing their fatisfaction fatisfaction in the measures already pursued, and giving him the strongest assurances, "that they would support him in such farther measures as might be found necessary to maintain the Civil . Magistrates in a due execution of the Laws within the Massachusetts Bay; and beseeching him to direct the Governor to take the most effectual methods for procuring the fullest information touching all TREASONS committed within that Government fince the 30th December 1767, and to transmit the fame, with the names of the persons most active in the commission of such offences, in order that his Majesty might issue a special commission for hearing and determining the faid offences within the realm, purfuant to the statute of the 35th year of Henry VIII." In reply his Majesty affured them, "that he would not fail in the mode they had recommended, to give the most effectual orders for bringing the authors of the late diforders in the province of Maffachufetts to condign punish-MENT." Thus was an obfolete and tyrannical ftatute of the most arbitrary of the English Monarchs. revived in the reign of George III. in the vain hope to fubdue that unconquerable spirit of liberty in America, which only blazed the more fiercely and dangeroufly for the repeated attempts to overwhelm or extinguish it. "Confider well," faid Colonel Barré to the Ministers, when the Address was pending in the House of Commons, "what you are doing. Why will you deceive yourselves and us? You know that it is not this or that place only that disputes your right, but every part. They tell you with one voice, from one end of the Continent to the other, that you have no right to tax America." When this Address reached the western fhore of the Atlantic, the Assemblies of Massachusetts and New York no longer existed; but Virginia, on this occasion, assumed the lead with equal spirit and sirmness. On the 16th May (1769) they came to feveral refolutions, copies of which they ordered their Speaker to transmit to the different Assemblies throughout the Continent, and to request their concurrence. These resolutions imported, "that the fole right of imposing taxes on the inhabitants of the Colony is now, and ever hath been, in the House of Burgesses, with confent of the Council, and of the King, or Governor for the time being :- That it is the privilege of the inhabitants to petition their Sovereign for redress of grievances; and that it is lawful to procure the concurrence of his Majesty's other Colonies in dutiful Addresses, praying the royal interposition in favour of the violated rights of America: - That all trials for treason, or misprission of treason, here committed, ought to be in and before his Majesty's Courts within the said Colony; and, that fending accused persons to be tried beyond the feas, is highly derogatory to the rights of British

British subjects." These resolutions were followed by a humble Address to the King, beseeching his royal interpofition to guiet the minds, of his loyal fubjects in the Colonies, and to avert those dangers and miferies which will enfue from a departure from the antient rules and maxims of Government." The next day, Lord Bottetourt, the Governor, declared to the Affembly, that these resolutions had made it his duty to dissolve them; and that they were diffolved accordingly. The Affembly immediately voted themselves into a Convention, and choofing the late Speaker, Peyton Randolph, Efq. Moderator, they entered unanimously into an Affociation against importing, not only the taxed commodities, but wines and other articles; and the fimple recommendations of this Convention had throughout the province all the force and efficacy of law. The neighbouring province of Maryland followed the example of this great and leading Colony, in respect to the non-importation agreement; and the North Carolina Affembly adopting, by an express vote, the resolutions passed by Virginia, were also dissolved by Governor Tryon.

The General Court of Massachusetts being called together in the course of the summer 1769, in conformity to their charter, immediately presented an Address to his Excellency the Governor, for the removal of the naval and military force stationed in the town and harbour of Boston; to which

which the Governor returned for answer, "that he had no authority over his Majesty's ships in this port, or his troops within this town." The House refusing to proceed to business while they were furrounded with an armed force, the Governor adjourned the Court to the town of Cambridge; foon after which they passed resolutions similar to those of Virginia; and also a vote, " that the fending an armed force into the Colony, under pretence of affifting the civil power, is highly dangerous to the people, unprecedented, and unconftitutional." The Governor calling upon them to declare, whether they would or would not make provision for the troops agreeably to the injunctions of the Act of Parliament? the House anfwered, " As we cannot confiftently with our honor or interest; much less with the duty we owe to our conftituents; so we never shall make any provision of funds for the purposes in your several messages." Upon this the Governor prorogued them to the 10th of January, 1770, to meet at Bofton. The proposition adopted by the British Parliament, for transporting persons from America in order to trial in Great Britain, by a forced and. unheard of construction of the old statute of Henry VIII. excited prodigious alarm throughout the Continent. The House of Representatives of Virginia, in their Address to the King, express with feeling and dignity the fentiments which, wounded wounded by fuch cruel provocation, must necesfarily animate the breafts of freemen. we confider," fay they, "that, by the established Laws and Constitution of this Colony, the most ample provision is made for apprehending and punishing all those who shall dare to engage in any treasonable practices against your Majesty, or disturb the tranquillity of Government, we cannot without horror think of the unufual, and, permit us with all humility to add, unconftitutional and illegal mode recommended to your Majesty, of feizing and carrying beyond the fea the inhabitants of America suspected of any crime, and of trying fuch perfons in any other manner than by the antient and long-established course of proceedings: for how truly deplorable must be the case of a wretched American, who, having incurred the displeasure of any one in power, is dragged from his native home-conveyed to a diftant land, where no friend will alleviate his diftreffes, and where no witness can be found to testify his innocence!"

In the course of this summer (1769) was transmitted to the Governors of the different provinces, the samous circular letter of Lord Hillsborough, containing a virtual renunciation of suture taxation, and an engagement, so far as the Ministers of the Crown could engage, to repeal, on the principles of commercial expediency, the taxes already substissing fubfifting on glass, paper, and colors. But America was now too much irritated and inflamed to be easily or speedily appealed. The exception of the duty on tea was regarded as infidious, and indicatory of ministerial fraud and finesse; and it was universally declared, that nothing less than a repeal of all the revenue acts, and the other odious and oppressive laws passed in the present reign, could lay the foundation of a solid and permanent re-union between Great Britain and her Colonies.

The refidence of the military at Boston, far from preserving the peace of the town, was the occasion. of perpetual tumult and disturbance. The Governor, Sir Francis Bernard, from the violence of his temper grew every day more obnoxious to the inhabitants, and the licentiousness of the Boston populace feemed to threaten his personal safety; notwithstanding which, he scrupled not to walk frequently alone and unattended at his villa in the vicinity of the metropolis. On being asked whether he: had no apprehensions of danger, he replied, "No; they are not a blood-thirfty people." He was at length recalled in the autumn of 1769, in order to lay. before the King the true state of the Province, and was fucceeded by Mr. Hutchinson, who had long filled the post of Lieutenant Governor. Early in the fpring of the enfuing year 1770, a quarrel between the military and the townsmen of Boston took place, more ferious than any of those which had preceded preceded it. A private of the 29th regiment pasting early on the Saturday morning along a public rope-walk, was provoked by infulting words to engage a party of his comrades to attack the ropemakers. The battle being indecifive, it was determined to fight it out on the Monday. The populace being in the interim fully apprifed of the intended encounter, affembled in great numbers armed with clubs and other weapons at the time appointed; the bells also ringing an alarum, and violent clamors of "Town-born, turn out," being heard in all parts of the city. The mob directed its course to Murray's barracks, and dared the foldiery by very offensive language to combat, which they were with great difficulty prevented from doing by the officers. At length retiring from the barracks, the populace were addressed in the ftreet by "a tall large man in a red cloak and a white wig;" and after liftening for fome minutes to hisharangue with great attention, they exclaimed with shouts and huzzas "For the main-guard!" for which they immediately began their route in different divisions. Captain Preston, the officer on duty, on the appearance of the frantic multitude, who with oaths and execrations preffed in upon the foldiers, advancing to the very points of the bayonets, endeavoured by every effort to reftrain the foldiers from violence. But a party the most furious of the populace, in failors habits, struck the guns down with their clubs, and a blow was aimed by one of them at Captain Preston. On which a confused noise of "Fire!" was heard, and feveral pieces being discharged, ten or twelve persons were killed or wounded. The drums now beat every where to arms! and the townsmen assembled to the amount of many thoufands: but the Governor at length making his appearance in person, they were prevailed upon, it being now moonlight, to disperse. The next morning the people again collected in vaft bodies, and the Governor affembling a Council was urged to order the immediate removal of the troops; to which he most reluctantly affented, being told by Mr. Oliver the Lieutenant Governor, that he had no other option but to comply, or leave the province. On this removal the ferment began to fubfide. In the mean time, Captain Preston and others were committed to prison, in order to take their trial, as not having acted under the fanction of the civil magistrate; and the funeral of the four persons killed in the late riot was celebrated with great and pompous folemnity, being followed by an immenfe concourse of people, and the procession closed by a long train of carriages belonging to the principal inhabitants of the town. Notwithstanding the vehement indignation excited by the late transactions, Captain Preston and the other prisoners, after a full and fair trial, were by a verdict worthy of the highest praise honourably acquitted, two only excepted, who Vol. II. were were found guilty of manflaughter. Mr. Quincy and Mr. Adams, counsel for the prisoners, and themselves warm partisans of liberty, exerted their utmost ability in their defence. "We must," faid one of these gentlemen, addressing the Jury, " steel ourselves against prepossessions which contaminate the fountain of justice. To your candor and impartiality I submit the prisoners and their cause. The Law, in all viciffitudes of government, fluctuations of paffion, or flights of enthufiafin, will preferve a fleady undeviating course. To use the words of a patriot, a hero, a martyr to liberty, ALGERNON SYDNEY, 'Tis mens fine affectu; without any regard to perions it commands that which is good, and it punishes that which is evil; it is deaf, inexorable, inflexible. On the one hand, it is inexorable to the cries and lamentations of the prisoners; on the other, it is deaf, deaf as an adder, to the clamors of the populace."

On the 31st May, 1770, the Assembly of Massachusetts was convened at Cambridge. The House immediately presented a remonstrance to the Governor against its being held there, or at any other place than Boston, and, by a majority of ninety voices, voted it to be a grievance, and resolved not to proceed to business; on which the Governor proroqued them to the month of July. On re-assembling, they persisted in their former resolution, and were again proroqued to September. In an Address dress to the Governor, previous to the last prorogation, the Assembly, with minds apparently oppressed by gloomy and prophetic forebodings, infifted upon the right of the people to appeal to Heaven in difputes between them and persons in power, when there is an abuse of power. "We would, however, ay they, by no means be understood to suggest that this people have occasion at present to proceed to fuch extremity; yet grievances and cruelties too many to be enumerated, too melancholy to be much longer borne by this people, we have feen brought upon us." On the third meeting of the Affembly, September 26, the Governor informed them that the garrison at the castle in the pay of the province was to be withdrawn by order of his Majesty, and the fortress to be garrisoned by regular troops; and that his orders were, to deliver it up to fuch officer as General Gage should direct to take the command of it. The Assembly in reply observed, "If the custody and government of the fortress be now lodged with the military power, independent of the fupreme civil magistrate within this jurisdiction, it is fo effential an alteration of the Constitution as must justly alarm a free people." The House, from the necessity of the case, now proceeded to business; and before the prorogation, they established a "Committee of Correspondence, to communicate with such committees as may be appointed by other Colonies." In the month of April, 1771, the General Court was C 2 again again convened at Cambridge; and against this obnoxious exertion of power the Affembly again remonstrated, and entered their protest. The Governor informing the House, that by his Majesty's instructions he was forbidden to give his affent to any Act subjecting the Commissioners of the Customs. and other officers of the Crown, to be taxed by the usual affectors for the profits of their commissions, the House in language daring and indignant replied: "We know of no Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs, nor of any revenue his MAJESTY has a right to establish in North America. We know and feel a tribute levied and extorted from those, who, if they have property, have a right to the absolute disposal of it." The session passed heavily in fullen filence, or angry recrimination.

On the succeeding year, May 1772, the General Court being again convened at Cambridge, the Governor acquainted the House, that his Majesty had made provision for his support; on which the House, by a message to the Governor, declared, "that the making provision for his Excellency's support, independent of the grants and acts of the General Assembly, and the Governor's receiving the same, is an infraction upon the rights of the inhabitants granted by the royal charter." An unfortunate incident about this time took place at Rhode Island, which proved a new source of animosity and discord. Lieutenant Duddington, commander of the Gaspee Gaspee armed schooner, an officer very obnoxious by his extraordinary zeal and vigilance in the execution of the revenue laws, falling in with the Providence packet, employed in the transportation of goods and paffengers to Newport, ordered by fignal the mafter to lower his colors; which being difregarded, he fired a flot at the packet and chased. It being near high water, the packet flood close-in with the land, defigning that the Gaspee should be run aground in the chase. The Gaspee accordingly was foon fast; and, the tide having now done flowing, could by no means disengage herself. So favorable an opportunity of revenge on a man univerfally detefted, could not eafily again occur. the night a number of whale-boats filled with armed men boarded the schooner, and, after some resistance, made themselves masters of the vessel, which they immediately fet on fire and burnt with all her stores; and though a reward of 500l. was offered for the discovery of these daring offenders, no evidence could be obtained against them. This event gave rife to an Act of the British Parliament, by which wilfully and maliciously to destroy his Majesty's ships, ammunition, or stores, is made capital, and fubjects the offender, as well in America as England, to a trial at the pleasure of his Majesty in any county of Great-Britain. 'Such are the progressive steps by which Tyranny forges his chains, and peoples his dungeons. A Government which has loft the confidence C 3 fidence of its subjects is urged to oppression not less by necessity than inclination.

The Judges of the Superior Court of the Maffachusetts province, though removable at the pleasure of the Crown, had hitherto depended on the General Affembly for the continuance of their falaries; but they had now falaries fettled upon them by his Majesty, so that the balance of the Constitution was in this respect entirely subverted; both the weights of justice, as was observed, being by this means put into the fame scale. Of all the arbitrary innovations of the British Government, none excited greater refentment, or was deemed more dangerous, than Nothing, indeed, could be more opposite to the genius of the British Constitution, which regards the independency of the judicial power on the executive as one of the most important bulwarks of liberty. Committees of Correspondence had been recently established in the different towns and townships throughout the province: and the spirit which now pervaded the Continent may be conjectured from the refolutions passed by the municipal bodies, amongst which, those of the town of Peterfham may be cited as exhibiting a curious specimen of that religious enthusiasin by which the inhabitants of New England were once fo strongly marked, and which combined with political enthusiasin---and experience flows how cafily they coalefce---gives to the human mind, perhaps, the utmost momentum and energy of which it is capable. I. Refolved, That with a Governor appointed from Great Britain during pleafure, with a large flipend dependent upon the will of the Crown, with all officers, civil and military, subject to his appointment or consent, with a castle in the hands of a standing army stationed in the very bowels of the land, no people can ever be truly free. II. That the Parliament of Great Britain usurping and exercising a legislative authority over, and extorting an unrighteous revenue from these colonies, is against all divine and human laws. The late appointment of falaries to be paid to our Superior Court Judges, whose creation, pay, and commission depend on mere will and pleasure, completes a fystem of bondage equal to any ever fabricated by the combined efforts of the ingenuity, malice, fraud, and wickedness of man. III. That it is the opinion of this town, that a despotic arbitrary Government is the kingdom of this world, as fet forth in the New Testament, and has a direct tendency to fink a people into a profound state of ignorance and irreligion; and that if we have an eye to our own and posterity's happiness, not only in this world but in the world to come, it is our duty to oppose such a Government. The inhabitants of Petersham conclude with a declaration, "that it is highly becoming towns and individuals to humble themselves before Almighty God, seriously to C 4 commune commune with their own hearts, and feek carefully with tears for the causes of the prevailing distresses of the land; and they express their confidence that Gon will not fuffer this land, where the Gofpel hath flourished, to become a flave of the world. He will ftir up witnesses of the truth, and in his own time fpirit his people to ftand up for his cause, and deliver them. In a fimilar belief that Patriot of Patriots the great Algernon Sydney lived and died, and dying breathed a like fentiment and prophecy touching his own and the then approaching timesa prophecy however not accomplished until a glorious REVOLUTION." The extravagant and exaggerated language of these resolutions is itself as most striking evidence of that diseased and dangerous flate of the public mind which could prompt these effusions of enthusiastic zeal. By a long series of acts of irritation and oppression on the part of Britain, a spirit of resentment, scarcely short of phrenfy, was excited throughout America. Allfeemed to feel the influence of "the madding hour;" and by the natural and determinate operation of a fystem detested and detestable, a system by which the present reign has been so conspicuoufly and fatally marked, was this change wrought in a loyal, orderly, and peaceable people, diftinguifhed above all others for their love of liberty and hatred of licentiousness-all ranks and conditions of whom gloried in their connection with Britain, rejoiced in her friendship and protection, and triumphed in her prosperity.

During the fession of the Massachusetts Assembly, in the fummer of 1773, a discovery was made which added fresh fuel to the flame long fince kindled in that province. The celebrated Dr. Franklin, Agent of the House of Representatives in England, had by fome unknown means acquired possession of certain letters written in confidence by the Governor Hutchinson, the Lieutenant Governor Oliver, and others, to divers of their friends and correspondents in England, in which they express themselves very freely on the situation of affairs in America: and their fentiments are fuch as might reasonably be expected from their public conduct. The writers appear to have been men very respectable in their private characters; but viewing the transactions which were passing before them through a thick cloud of prejudice, refentment, and interest, they discover an eager folicitude that Government should adopt more violent, or in their language "more vigorous, measures in support of its authority;" and in their laudable anxiety for the re-establishment of order and tranquillity, they feemed not in the least to suspect, that of fuch measures a civil war must be the inevitable refult: nor had they the wifdom or magnanimity to comprehend, that far other ties than military force force and imperious edicts were necessary to form that bond of connection which could alone reftore peace and prosperity to the Colonics, or render the connection itself advantageous or honorable to the Mother Country. These letters were, by a license which cannot be justified, even though prompted by motives the most patriotic, transmitted by Dr. Franklin to his conftituents at Boston, upon whom they made an impression much easier to conceive than to describe. "This, says Mr. Hutchinson, in one of his letters, is most certainly a crisis. If no measures shall have been taken to secure the dependence of the Colonies, befides fome declaratory acts and refolves, it is all over with us. There must be an abridgment of what are called English liberties; and he lays it down as a maxim, that a Colony cannot enjoy all the liberty of the Parent State. I wish, says he, the good of the Colony, when I wish to see some farther restraint of liberty rather than the connection with the Parent State should be broken. In another letter he expresses his hopes that provisions for disfolving the commercial combinations, and for inflicting penalties on those who do not renounce them, would be made as foon as Parliament meets." Mr. Oliver, the Lieutenant Governor, intimates that the officers of the Crown, i. e. the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and Judges, ought to be made independent of the pcople; for, fays he, it is a difficult matter to ferve two mafters. The Government, he affirms, has been too weak to fubdue the turbulent fpirits. finuates the expediency of "TAKING OFF" those perfons whom he ftyles "the original incendiaries." He wishes for the institution of an order of Patricians, and afferts the necessity of an ALTERATION OF THE CHARTERS." The Affembly, thrown into a violent flame by the reading of these letters, unapimoufly refolved, "that the tendency and defign of the faid letters was to overthrow the Constitution of this Government, and to introduce arbitrary power into the Province;" and a petition was immediately voted to the King, to remove the Governor Hutchinson, and the Licutenant Governor Oliver, for ever from the government of the Province.

This Petition being transmitted to the Agent of the Assembly, Dr. Franklin, was by him delivered to Lord Dartmouth; and on its being prefented to the King, his Majesty signified his pleafure that it should be laid before him in Council. On the 29th of January 1774, Dr. Franklin was summoned in his official capacity as Agent of the Province, in support of the petition. Mr. Wedderburn, now Lord Loughborough and Chancellor of Great Britain*, appearing as counsel for the defendants, delivered in that capacity against the Agent, the House of Representatives, the Province of Massachusetts, and the whole Continent of America, one of the most extraordinary invectives that was on any occasion perhaps ever heard in the Council Chamber. " Dr. Franklin, faid Mr. Wedderburn, stands in the light of the first mover and prime conductor of this whole contrivance against his Majesty's two Governors; and having, by the help of his own special confidents and party leaders, first made the Assembly bis agent in carrying on his own fecret defigns, he now appears before your Lordships to give the finishing stroke to the work of his own hands. How thefe letters came into possession of any one but the right owners, is a mystery for Dr. Franklin to explain. Your Lordfhips know the train of mischiefs which followed this concealment *. After they had been left for five months to have their full operation, at length comes out a letter, which it is impossible to read without horror, expressive of the coolest and most deliberate malevolence. My Lords, what poetic fiction only had penned for the breaft of a cruel African, Dr. Franklin has realized and transcribed from his own—His too is the language of a ZANGA.

Know then 'twas I,

I forged the letter, I disposed the picture:

I hated, I despised, and I destroy.

And

^{*} In consequence of the transmission of these letters, a duel was fought between Mr. Whately, brother to the correspondent of the two Governors, and his friend Mr. Temple, who mutu-

And he now appears before your Lordships, wrapped up in impenetrable secrecy, to support a charge against his Majesty's Governor and Lieutenant Governor, and expects that your Lordships should advice the punishing them on account of certain letters which he will not produce, and which he dares not tell how he obtained. These are the leffons taught in Dr. Franklin's school of politics. With regard to his conftituents, the factious leaders at Boston, who make this complaint against their Governors, if the relating of their evil doings be criminal, and tending to alienate his Majesty's affections, must not the doing of them be much more fo? Yet now they ask that his Majesty will gratify and reward them for doing these things, and that he will punish their Governors for relating them, because they are so very bad that it cannot but offend his Majesty to hear of them." From these passages some judgment may be formed of the general strain of this famous Philippic, which, violating every rule and limit of decorum, stands upon record as the groffest infult ever offered to a great and venerable character, the most distinguished ornament of his age and country. A-wife Government would have known his value, and ally suspected each other of being accessary to the communication of them, and in this rencounter Mr. Whately was dangerously wounded.

been happy to have availed itself of his experience and fagacity; but the counfels of a Franklin under the present reign were not likely to preponderate over those of a Hutchinson. The report of the Lords of the Council was in a few days afterwards made. the King's most excellent Majesty being present, "that the petition in question was founded upon false and erroneous allegations, and that the same is groundless, vexatious, and scandalous, and calculated only for the feditious purpofes of keeping up a spirit of clamor and discontent in the Province." And his Majesty was pleased, upon taking the faid report into confideration, to approve thereof, and to order the faid petition of the Assembly of Massachufetts to be difmiffed accordingly. Such was the mode in which a petition from the first Provincial Legislature in the Empire, composed of men eminent for ability and integrity, was treated by the British Government, which perhaps had never duly pondered the antient maxim of moral and political wisdom, "that pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." But a matter of higher import, and attended with far more ferious confequences, which at this time took place, is now to be related.

When at a very early period of Lord North's Administration the duties on paper, glass, and colors were repealed, it has been already remarked, that the duty on TEA was purposely left as a mark of Legislative Supremacy. The East India Company finding their stock of tea to accumulate in their warehouses, in consequence of the loss of the American market, were very urgent with the Minifter to repeal the American import duty of threepence per pound, offering in lieu of it to pay double the fum on exportation. A fairer opportunity could not occur to terminate the dispute. As the duty would not have been taken off at the instance of the Americans, either in the dread of their refentment, or in the prospect of their advantage, it might have been hoped that the most strenuous flickler for "the dignity of the Crown," and "the honor of Parliament," whose sleeping and waking dreams had centred folely in these beloved and darling objects, might at length have banished his perturbations; and preffed his pillow in peace. This concession, however, the Minister was not inclined, or, which is far more probable, was not PERMITTED to make; and things remained on this footing, till in the fession of 1773 the Act passed for allowing the exportation of TEAS duty-free, and the Company, eager to make a grand effort to relieve themselves from their difficulties, were buoyed. up with the flattering expectation, by becoming their own factors, of regaining possession of the American market: for when the teas were actually transported across the Atlantic, and lodged in warehouses, the mere circumstance of their having previoufly

-viously paid the import duty would not, it was imagined, impede the Company's fales. In this idea, however, they were most egregiously and fatally mistaken. The Americans considered this new attempt in no other light than as an infidious artifice and collusion, calculated and defigned to inveigle them into the payment of this tax, in order to ESTABLISH THE PRECEDENT; and they were firmly and unanimously determined that no such project should take effect. Six hundred chefts were by the Company in pursuance of the late Act configned to their agent at Boston, the like quantity to New York and Philadelphia, and in proportion to the other principal ports of the Continent. fylvania on this occasion distinguished herfelf by setting the first example of opposition. A general meeting was convened at Philadelphia, in which a feries of vigorous refolutions were paffed, "declaring this new ministerial plan of importation to be a violent attack upon the liberties of America, and pronouncing it to be the duty of every American to oppose this attempt; and that whoever should directly or indirectly countenance it was an enemy to his country." A Committee was then appointed to wait upon the Configuees of the Company, and to request their refignation, which was immediately complied with. At New York, on the arrival of the tea-ships, in December, they were with difficulty permitted to approach the wharf:

wharf; and, as at Philadelphia, the confignees were compelled to relinquish their appointments, and the Thips returned back to England without breaking At Charlestown, after much opposition and bulk. tumult, the tea was permitted to be unloaded, but was immediately lodged in damp unventilated cellars, where it long remained, and finally perifhed. In no place was the delivery of it to the confignees fuffered, and in most the captains of the India fhips, on being apprized of the temper and disposition of the people, without any attempt to land wifely fet their fails for England. At Boston the spirit of refiftance rose to a height which made the excesses committed elsewhere appear trivial. At a general meeting of the inhabitants, the refolves of the City of Philadelphia were unanimoufly adopted, and a Committee appointed to wait upon the confignees, to know whether they would refign their appointments, which they declared not to be in their power. At a fucceeding meeting at Faneuil Hall, it was voted with loud acclamations, "that the tea shall not be landed, that no duty shall be paid, and that it shall be fent back in the same bottoms." "We must not," said a leading Member of the Affembly, "flatter ourselves, that popular resolves," popular fhouts, or harangues will vanquish our foes or terminate our trials. We must be ignorant of the power of those who have combined against us; we must be blind to that malice, inveteracy and re-VOL. II.

venge which have uniformly actuated their conduct, to hope that we shall end this controversy without the sharpest, sharpest conslict. Let us weigh and confider, before we determine upon those measures which must bring on the most terrible ftruggle which this country ever experienced." The question was again put, and passed without a negative. On an application from the Captain of the Dartmouth East Indiaman to the Governor, for a clearance, he replied, "I cannot give you a pass confiftent with the laws and my duty to the King, unless the vessel is properly qualified from the Custom House." Upon this answer being reported to the Affembly, the meeting was declared to be diffolved. An immense crowd repaired in haste to the quay, and a number of the most resolute, in the difguife of Mohawk Indians, boarded the veffels, and in about two hours broke open three hundred and forty-two chefts of tea, and difcharged their contents into the fea. Such was the confequence of the obstinacy of the Governor, who might have recollected that his predeceffor Sir Francis Bernard, in a like exigency, granted permits to many ships not qualified for want of ftamps, and that the prudence and propriety of his conduct had never been called in question. But the present Governor had long been the urgent advocate for measures of coercion on the part of Great Britain, and was probably not displeased to fee matters tending to a crifis: and, in a fubfequent quent declaration, he affigned fomewhat unwarily as one of the reasons for this refusal, "that by a compliance with the demand of the people be should have rendered bimself obnoxious to bis Soveneign." This undoubtedly is the MASTER-KEY which unfolds all the apparent abfurdities and extravagancies of his conduct. The temper of the British Court was fo well understood in America, that no one prefumed to hope they would be induced; by this determined and inflexible spirit of opposition in the Colonies, to defift from their ruinous projects. On the contrary, measures of vengeance were confidently expected; and even perfons of acknowledged moderation, on perceiving the ideas which they had long cherished of reconciliation to be hopeless, declared their resolution, in case matters were carried to extremity by Great Britain, to join the flandard of their countrymen. A Major of Provincials, who had been foreman of the jury on the trial of Capt. Pretton, and to whom, in reward of his meritorious conduct, the Governor had given this commission, faid to him with unexpected energy, "Sir, you know that I am a friend to Government, and wish to support it; but if any attempt be made to violate our CHARTER, I will fight up to my knees in blood in defence of it."

On the meeting of the General Court of Maffachufetts, A. D. 1774, the House of Representatives seemed in no respect disposed to recede from the D2 highest highest claims and pretensions they had formed. On the contrary, they, by a new assumption of authority, determined upon an impeachment of the Chief Justice Oliver, for refusing to relinquish the falary fettled upon him by the Crown-which, combined with the hope of its augmentation, they affirmed "must have the effect of a perpetual bribe, and expose him to the violation of his oath-that the acceptance of this falary, unprecedented in all former times, was, a breach of his implied engagements on entering into his office; and that by receiving a grant payable out of the revenue unjustly extorted from the American Colonies, he had given a fanction to the injustice, counteracted the petitions of the people, and wickedly endeavoured to increase the discontents and jealousies which had originated from this grievance." The Governor refusing to receive the accusation, no other effect resulted from it than to render the Governor and the Chief Justice more obnoxious, and to keep alive the spirit of animosity and resistance.

On the 13th of January, 1774, the Parliament of Great Britain was convened at Westminster. The Ministry not being as yet in possession of full information from America, the Speech from the Throne observed a prosound filence relative to the late transactions; but on the 7th of March a Message was delivered from his Majesty to both Houses of Parliament, informing them, that, "in confequence of the unwarrantable practices carried on in North America, and particularly of the violent and outrageous proceedings at the town and port of Boston, with a view of obstructing the commerce of this kingdom, and upon grounds and pretences immediately fubverfive of its conflitution, it was thought fit to lay the whole matter before Parliament-recommending it to their ferious confideration what farther regulations or permanent provifions might be necessary to be established." Lord-North, who prefented the meffage, laid at the fame time before the House of Commons a great number of papers, which fufficiently shewed the daring and feditious spirit which now prevailed over the whole Continent of America. His Lordship, on enlarging upon these documents represented the conduct of the inhabitants of Boston in the most atrocious light. He afferted that the utmost lenity on the part of the Governor, PERHAPS TOO MUCH; had been already fhewn, and that this town, by its late proceedings, had left Government perfectly at liberty to adopt any measures they should think convenient, not only for redreffing the wrong fuftained by the East India Company, but for inflict: ing fuch punishment as their factious and criminal conduct merited; and that the aid of Parliament would be reforted to for this purpose, and for vindicating the dignity of the Crown, so daringly and wantonly D_3 wantonly attacked, and contemned." The speech of the Minister was received with great applause, and the House appeared clearly and unanimously of opinion, that firm and vigorous measures were at this crifis abfolutely necessary. It was then moved, "that an address of thanks should be prefented to the King, affuring his Majesty, that they would not fail to exert every means in their power of effectually providing for the due execution of the laws, and fecuring the just dependance of the Colonies upon the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain." This excited fome faint flew of oppofition, and it was remarked, "that fimilar affurances had been already often repeated, but that the measures hitherto adopted by Ministers for the support of the DIGNITY OF THE CROWN had only exposed it to fcorn, obloquy, and contempt. the prefent case was of the utmost importance they admitted, and it required therefore an attentive and impartial examination. In order to do the Americans justice it was necessary to trace the fource of these calamities to their origin, in a system of arbitrary and unwife measures at home." inclination however appeared to enter into any retrospective investigations, and the address was finally agreed to, and prefented to the King.

In a fhort time the Minister began to develop his grand plan of coercion and punishment, by the introduction of a Bill for discontinuing the lading and shipping of goods, wares, and merchandize at the town of Boston or the harbour thereof; and for the removal of the Custom House, &c. to the town of Salem. This Bill'was to continue in force, not only till full and ample compensation was made to the East India Company for the damage sustained by them, but till the King in Council should declare himfelf fatisfied as to the reftoration of peace and good order in the town. This Bill was honored with the general approbation of the House: and it was unavailingly urged by a few individuals, that the penal clauses of the Bill should be carried into execution only on the proviso of a refusal to indemnify the Company on the part of the town. Such was the indignation excited by the late atrocious violation of the laws, that the House appeared reluctant to liften to any palliative arguments or perfuafives to moderation; and it must indeed be acknowledged that the Empire was now, by unexampled indifcretion brought into a fearful and hazardous dilemma. Good policy evidently fuggested conciliation as the grand object which ought not for a moment to be loft fight of. It was first, and last, and midst, in every generous and reflecting mind; but then this conciliation ought not to be accompanied with any real degradation on the part of Great Britain. It was not less for the advantage of America than of Britain, that the just and constitutional authority of the Mother Country, upon the antient and chablished principles of superiority and fubordination, should be maintained. To pass over such enormities, as had now taken place, without notice or animadversion, would indeed have been a dereliction of that authority; but great caution was neccffary, now that the passions were awakened, so to temper justice with lenity, as to demonstrate that the decisions of the supreme power of the Empire were neither tinctured with the meanness of malice or the folly of revenge. Had the penal clauses of the Boston Port-Bill been properly modified, and the duty on tea, which had given rife to these fatal contentions, at the same time repealed, there is no doubt but a compensation to the Company would have been immediately voted, the honor of Government would have been maintained, and a fure foundation laid for a permanent reconciliation. But how rarely are the refolutions adopted in anger founded in wifdom! The idea of this repeal was fuggested in the House of Commons, but repressed with inestable disdain, and the Bill passed both Houses without a division.

Very foon after this, a fecond Bill was introduced by the Minister, for the better regulating the government of the Province of Maffachusetts Bay. By this Bill the charter of the Province was entirely subverted, and the nomination of the counfellors, judges, and magistrates of all kinds, including sheriffs, was vested in the Crown, and all these officers made removeable at PLEASURE. This Bill the Minister affirmed to be absolutely necessary, for preventing the rest of the Colonies from being tainted by the feditious example of Maffachufetts The Opposition now feemed to rife into fome degree of firmness and vigour. It was asked, whether the Colonies already regulated nearest to the manner proposed by this Bill, were more submiffive to the right of taxation than Maffachufetts? It was afferted that the diforder lay much deeper than in any diversities that subsisted in the Colonial forms of Government; that the people throughout the whole extent of that vaft Continent were univerfally diffatisfied, and the uneafiness and refistance were no less in the Royal Governments than in any other. By an invafion of the charter, the cause of Massachusetts will be made the common cause of all the Colonies, who have no other or better fecurity for the continuance of their own." It was finally carried by a prodigious majority of 239 against 64 voices, May 2, 1774. In the House of Lords the Bill did not pass without the feverest strictures; the final division on the general question was 92 to 20, and an animated and excellent protest against it was signed by eleven peers, amongst whom were the Dukes of Richmond and Portland, and the Marquis of Rockingham. "Bcfore the rights of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay, which they derive from their charter, are taken away, the definite legal offence by which a forfeiture of that charter is incurred," fay their Lordships, "ought to have been clearly stated, and the parties heard in their own defence; and the merc celerity of a decision against it will not reconcile the minds of the people to that mode of government which is to be established upon its ruins. On the general allegations of a declaratory preamble, the rights of any public body may be taken away, and any vifionary scheme of government substituted in their place. By this Bill, the Governor and Council are invested with dangerous powers, unknown to the British Constitution, and with which the King himself is not intrusted. By the appointment and removal of the Sheriff at pleasure, they have the means of returning fuch Juries as may best suit with the gratification of their pasfions and interests; the life, liberty, and property of the fubject are put into their hands without control. The weak, injudicious, and inconfiftent measures of the Ministry have given new force to the distractions of America, which on the repeal of the Stamp Act were subsiding; have revived dangerous questions, and gradually estranged the affections of the Colonics from the Mother Country. To render the Colonies permanently advantageous, they must be SATISFIED WITH THEIR CONDITION! that fatisfaction there is no chance of reftoring, but by recurring to the principles on which the repeal of the Stamp Act was founded."

The next step was, to bring in a Bill for the impartial administration of justice in the Province of Massachusetts Bay. This Bill provided, that in case any person was indicted in that Province for murder or any other capital offence, and it should appear by information given on oath to the Governor, that the fact was committed in the exercife or aid of Magistraey in suppressing riots, and that a fair trial could not be had in the Province. he should fend the person so indicted to any other Colony, or to Great Britain, to be tried; the Act to continue in force four years. This was the counter-part of the obsolete and tyrannical Act of Henry VIII. lately revived for the trial in Great Britain, of treasons committed in America. As that was intended for the punishment of the enemies of Government, this was defigned for the impunity of its friends. The opposition to this Bill in both Houses, though it finally passed by great majorities, was warm and vigorous. "By this Bill," faid Colonel Barre, at the close of an admirable speech, "you are offering the last of human outrages to the people in America, by fubjecting them in effect to military execution: instead of fending them the olive branch, you have fent the naked fword. What madness is it that prompts you to attempt obtaining that by force, which may be with fo much more facility and certainty procured by requisition? Retract your odious exertions of authority, and remember that the first step towards making them contribute to your wants, is to reconcile them to your Government." A Protest, not less spirited than the former, was entered against it in the House of Lords. "This Bill," faid the protesting Peers, "after the profcription of the port of Boston, the disfranchisement of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay, and the variety of provisions which have been made in this fession, for new-modelling the whole polity and judicature of this Province, is an humiliating confession of the weakness and inefficacy of all the proceedings of Parliament. By supposing that it may be impracticable by any means that the public wifdom could devife, to obtain a fair trial there for any who act under Government; the House is made virtually to acknowledge the British Government to be universally odious to the whole Province, and to the whole Continent. This Bill feems to be one of the many experiments towards an introduction of effential innovations into the government of this Empire. The virtual indemnity provided by this Bill for those who shall be indicted for murders committed under color of office, can answer no other purpose. We consider that to be an indemnity which renders trial and confequently punish-punishment impracticable; and trial is impracticable when the very Governor, under whose authority acts of violence may be committed, is empowered to fend the inftruments of that violence to 3000 miles distance from the scene of their offence, the reach of their profecutor, and the local evidence which may tend to their conviction "

It was a wonted faying of the famous Sir Francis Walfingham, "that a Statefinan must observe the joints and flexures of affairs;" but this was a species of knowledge which the Ministers of George III. difdained to fludy. All things muft, at all events, bend to their will; and if no "joints or flexures" were difcernible, the refiftance was to be overcome by acts and inftruments of political torture.

This bill being paffed, and the recess approaching, many Members were about to retire into the country, when their attention was recalled to another Bill, for making more effectual provision for the Government of the Province of Quebec. It passed through the House of Lords, where it originated, with unexpected facility; but met with an opposition in the House of Commons more. vehement than any of the former. The principal. objects of the bill were, to ascertain the limits of the province, which were now extended far beyond those settled by the proclamation of 1763, includ-

including that vast tract of territory southward of the Lakes, and bordering upon the great rivers Ohio and Missifippi; to establish a Legislative Council, the Counfellors to be appointed by the Crown, and the office to be held during pleafure: to confirm the French laws and a trial without Jury in civil cases; the English laws and a trial by Jury in Fiminal; to fecure to the Roman Catholic Clergy, the legal enjoyment of their tythes from all who were of their own religion. The revenue of the province was configned in the first instance to the Board of Treasury, for the support of an unlimited Civil Lift and the Administration of Justice; the Judges holding their offices and falaries during pleafure. Thus the government of Quebec was converted into a legal despotism, committed by Parliament into the hands of the Crown; and a striking proof was exhibited to the world. what the other provinces of America had to expect, when reduced to a loyal and dutiful fubmission. The provision made by this act for the Roman Catholic Clergy, occasioned a confiderable degree of odium and unpopularity to attend it without doors; but the zealous friends of liberty, with grief and aftonishment perceived, that the public at large not only acquicfeed in, but approved and applauded the measures now adopted for the subjugation and enflavement of America. So true is it, that a nation, which would risque every thing to secure its . wwn liberty, may be not the less inclined, upon that account, to domineer and tyrannize over others.

Lord Chatham's flate of health, during the two preceding fessions, had precluded him from making any confiderable parliamentary exertions, and he had rarely attended the House on any occasion; but, finding himfelf at this period fomewhat relieved from the preffure of his complaints, he took the opportunity, on the third reading of the bill for quartering foldiers in America, to lay before the House and the Public his thoughts on this bill, and on American affairs in general, in a speech worthy of his distinguished talents and illustrious reputation. " If," said he, "my Lords, we take a transient view of those motives which induced the ancestors of our fellow-subjects in America to leave their native country, to encounter the innumerable difficulties of the unexplored regions of the western world, our astonishment at the present conduct of their descendants will naturally fubfide. There was no corner of the globe. to which they would not have fled, rather than fubmit to the flavish and tyrannical spirit whichprevailed at that period in their native country; and viewing them in their originally forlorn and now flourishing state, they may be cited as illustrious instances to instruct the world, what great. exertions mankind will naturally make, when left to the free exercise of their own powers. withstandwithstanding my intention to give my hearty negative to the question now before you, I condemn, my Lords, in the feverest manner, the turbulent and unwarrantable conduct of the Americans in fome inftances, particularly in the late riots at Boston; but, my Lords, the mode which has been purfued to bring them back to a fense of their duty, is fo diametrically opposite to every principle of found policy, as to excite my utmost astonishment. You have involved the guilty and the innocent in one common punishment, and avenge the crime of a few lawless depredators upon the whole body of the inhabitants. My Lords, the different provinces of America, in the excess of their gratitude for the repeal of the Stamp Act, feemed to vie with each other in expressions of loyalty and duty; but the moment they perceived that your intention to tax them was renewed, under a pretence of serving the East India Company, their refentment got the ascendent of their moderation, and hurried them into actions, which their cooler reason would abhor. But, my Lords, from the whole complexion of the late proceedings, I cannot but incline to think, that Administration has purposely irritated them into these violent acts, in order to gratify their own malice and revenge. What else could induce them to dress Taxation, the father of American Sedition, in the robes of an East-India Director, but to break in upon that mutual peace and harmony which then fo happily subfifted between the Colonies and the Mother Country. My Lords, it has always been my fixed and unalterable opinion, and I will carry it with me to the grave, that this country had no right under Heaven to tax America. It is contrary to all the principles of justice and civil policy: it is contrary to that effential, unalterable right in nature, ingrafted into the British Constitution as a fundamental law, that what a man has honeftly acquired is abfoliately his own, which he may freely give, but which cannot be taken from him without his confent. Pass' then, my Lords, instead of these harsh and severe edicts, an amnesty over their errors; by measures of lenity and affection allure them to their duty; act the part of a generous and forgiving parent. A period may arrive, when this parent may fland in need of every affistance she can receive from a grateful and affectionate offspring. The welfare of this country, my Lords, has ever been my greatest joy, and under all the vicisfitudes of my life has afforded me the most pleasing consolation. Should the all-disposing hand of Providence prevent me from contributing my poor and feeble aid in the day of her diftrefs, my prayers shall be ever for her prosperity:--" Length of days be in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor! May her ways be ways of pleafantness, and all her paths be peace!"

VOL. II.

The only effort of a nature directly conciliatory in the course of the present session, was made by Mr. Rofe Fuller, Member for Rye, who on the 19th April (1774) moved, that the House refolve itself into a Committee, to take into consideration the duty on the importation of teas into America, and the appropriation of the same, with a view to its repeal. This motion was seconded and powerfully supported by Mr. Edmund Burke, in an elaborate speech, which excited very confiderable attention. This gentleman had, from the period of his first introduction to the House of Commons, as confidential Secretary to Lord Rockingham, during the administration of that Nobleman, diffinguished himself by the superiority. and splendor of his parliamentary talents; and he might at this time be confidered as the principal organ through which the political fentiments were communicated, of that once widely extended and potent connection of Whigs, of which Lord Rockingham had, fince the death of the Duke of Newcastle, been considered the head. The tide of power, of fortune, and of royal favor, having long fince flowed in a different channel, this party had been gradually deferted by many of their fummer friends, but still remained highly respectable from the firm conjunction of various families of the first distinction, who had ever been been numbered amongst the most zealous adherents of the Revolution, and Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover. The simple, unaffected, and unaffirming manners of the Marquis of Rockingham were amufingly contrafted in his representative Mr. Burke, whose deportment was lofty and supercilious, and whose speeches in Parliament were for the most part characterized by a florid, diffusive, and oftentatious style of eloquence, ill-adapted to the investigation of truth; calculated rather to dazzle than inform, abounding with vanity and egotifin; and apparently intended not fo much to exhibit the merits of the cause as the abilities of the speaker. Nevertheless, they displayed a great extent of knowledge; they were enlivened with frequent flashes of wit; they were illuminated with much brilliancy of allufion and metaphor; and adorned with burfts of oratory; bold, beautiful, and fublime. During the lifetime of the Marquis of Rockingham, he appeared, not indeed without some remarkable deviations; to adhere with laudable zeal to the genuine principles of Whiggifm: but from the lamented deceafe of that diftinguished Nobleman, he became on a fudden very capricious and eccentric in his conduct; and his judgment being naturally weak, and his passions proportionally violent and habitually indulged, the force of his genius in other refpects has unfortunately only plunged him, in the latter ary a F. 2 latter years of his life, deeper into the abysses of absurdity and extravagance.

In the course of Mr. Burke's speech on the prefent motion, he took occasion to draw the political portraits of feveral personages, who had, during the present reign, occupied the highest departments of the State. "To Mr. George Grenville, with whom the new Colony System had originated, he affirmed, that this country owed in other refpects great obligation. He had, as Mr. Burke believed, a very ferious defire to benefit the public; but with no small study of the detail; he did not feem to have equally carried his view to the total circuit of affairs. He generally confidered his objects in lights too much detached. This great person was bred to the law, a science rather calculated to invigorate than liberalize the underflanding. Paffing from that fludy, he did not go very largely into the world, but plunged into business; the business of office. But men too much conversant in office rarely possess minds of remarkable enlargement. Persons nurtured in the forms and habits of office, do admirably well as long as things go on in their common order; but when the high roads are broken up, when the waters are out, when a new and troubled feene is opened, and the file affords no precedent, then it is that a greater knowledge of mankind, and a far more extensive comprehension of things, are requisite than ever office gave, or than office: can ever give. He said, that in the year 1765, being in a very private station, unknowing and unknown, it was his fortune to become connected with a very noble person, the Marquis of Rockingham, then at the head of the Treasury department; and that he was placed in a fituation, which enabled him to discern in that noble person, such found principles, fuch an enlargement of mind, fuch clear and fagacious fense, and fuch unshaken fortitude, as had bound him, as well as others much better than him, by an inviolable attachment. The question of the repeal of the Stamp Act was brought on by the Marquis, in the very inftant when it was known that negociations were carrying on between the Court and the Leaders of Opposition. In the midst of a chaos of plots and counter-plots, of warfare against public oppofition and private treachery, it was that the firmness of this Noble Person was put to the proof. Every thing was full of traps and mines; Earth below shook: Heaven above menaced. All the elements of ministerial safety were dissolved; yet he remained fixed and determined in principle, in measure, and in conduct. He practised no management, he fought no apology, he fecured no retreat; but on the conclusion of an enquiry which lasted fix weeks, by a noble, spirited, and unexpected majority, in the teeth of all the old mercenary Swiss of State, in defiance of the whole embattled legion of veteran penfioners and practifed inftruments of a Court, gave a total repeal to the Stamp Act; and, if it had been so permitted, a lasting peace to the Empire. Of Lord Chatham Mr. Burke faid, that "the venerable age of this great man, his merited rank, his fuperior eloquence, his folendid qualities, his eminent fervices, the vaft space he filled in the eye of mankind, forbade him to censure his conduct; and to flatter him he was afraid. Let those who have betrayed him by their adulation, infult him by their malevolence. For a wife Minister, however, speaking with the freedom of history, Mr. Burke faid, he must surely be acknowledged to have adopted measures greatly mischievous to himself, perhaps for that reason fatal to his country; MEAsures, the effects of which are, I am afraid, FOR EVER INCURABLE. He made an Adminifiration to checquered and speckled; he put together a piece of joinery fo crossly indented, and whimfically dove-tailed; a Cabinet fo varioufly inlaid, fuch a piece of diversified mosaic, such-a teffelated pavement without cement, here a bit of black stone and there a bit of white; patriots and courtiers, King's friends and Republicans, Whigs and Tories, treacherous friends and open enemies; that it was indeed a very curious show, but utterly unfafe to touch, and unfure to ftand on. When his face - 95 -0 -- face was hid but for a moment, his whole fystem was on a wide fea, without chart or compass, whirled about, the fport of every guft; and those of the mariners who were most directly opposite to his opinions, being by far the most artful and powerful of the fet, feizing the helm, turned the vellel wholly out of the course of his policy." The House were much amused with these ingenious reprefentations; but no other effect was produced, the numbers on the division being 184 to 51. The feffion ended June 21, 1774, and his Majesty's speech contained a very high eulogium on the measures which had been adopted for the purpose of reclaiming his delided subjects; and on the temper, firmness, and unanimity, which had been displayed in the deliberations of Parliament, which could not fail of giving them the greatest weight. Indeed, fuch was the elation of the Court and its partifans at this period, that America feemed in their apprehension already subdued, and a complete victory obtained before the battle was begun.

Governor Hutchinfon, by whose advice the King and his Ministers had been chiefly guided, and who gave the most positive assurances, that a speedy and general submission would be the consequence of the measures which he recommended, had been for some time past in England; and General Gage, already Commander of the troops stationed at Boston, was appointed Governoops stationed at Boston, was appointed Governoops.

nor of the Province. He arrived in that city in the month of May, 1774, and was received with that dead and melancholy filence which portended a tremendous ftorm. The intelligence of the Boston Port Bill had been recently received; and on the day succeeding the arrival of the new Governor, a general meeting of the inhabitants was convened, in order to take it into confideration. At this meeting, a Refolution was passed, expresfive of their ideas of the impolicy, injustice, and barbarity of the Bill, and inviting the other Colonies to join with them in a general agreement, to put a stop to all exportation and importation to Great Britain and the West Indies till should it be repealed. Addresses from Virginia, Pennsylvania, the Carolinas, New-York, and the other Provinces, in a fhort time arrived, exhorting them, with many expressions of affection and sympathy, to resolution and perseverance; and declaring, that they confidered Boston as suffering in the common cause. One spirit, one undivided sentiment, of pity, indignation, and revenge, roused and pervaded all. A General Congress became the object of universal desire; and Philadelphia being judged commodiously situated for the purpose, it was convened to meet in that city on the 1st of September, and in the mean time combinations were every where entered into to fuspend all commercial intercourse with Great Britain; and renouncing nouncing all communication with those who should refuse to sign this Covenant, notwithstanding a Proclamation from General Gage, styling such agreement an unlawful, hostile, and traitorous combination. An Address being presented to him by the Municipality of Boston, in which the rights of the Colonies were afferted in a high and resolute tone, the Governor would not deign to hear it read to the end, declaring it to be an insult to his Majesty and his Government.

On the 25th of May, 1774, the New General Court met as usual at Boston, when General Gage gave them notice of their removal to Salem by the late Act. The Affembly hastening the public bufiness, in order to evade this necessity, the Governor adjourned the Court to the 7th of June, then to meet at Salem. The first business after this adjournment on the subsequent meeting at Salem, was to appoint Deputies to meet those of the other Colonies in General Congress at Philadelphia. The Governor, having received intimation of this defign, dispatched his Secretary with the greatest precipitation to dissolve the Court, but, on his arrival, he found the doors fast locked: and knocking aloud for entrance, he was informed, that the House was upon very important business, and till it was finished he could not be admitted. On which he read the Proclamation of Diffolution on the stairs leading to the hall of the 5 the Affembly; but the nomination of Deputies being previously made, this was confidered as an important advantage gained against the Governor.

It was a part of the artful and malignant plan of the British Ministers in framing the Boston Port Bill, by removing the commerce of that metropolis to Salem, and making it the feat of Government, to establish a rivalship and enmity between those two places, from which they hoped to derive mighty advantages. But the magnanimous spirit by which the Americans were at this period univerfally actuated, discovered itself very confpicuously in an Address presented by the Merchants and Freeholders of the Town of Salem, to the Governor, the day fucceeding the diffolution of the General Court. "We are," fay they, " most deeply afflicted with a fense of our public calamities :- by flutting up the port of Boston, some imagine that the course of trade might be turned hither, and to our benefit; but nature, in the formation of our harbor, forbids our becoming rivals in commerce with that convenient mart; and were it otherwise, we must be dead to every idea of justice, and lost to all feelings of humanity, could we indulge one thought to feize on wealth, and raife our fortunes on the ruin of our fuffering neighbors." Marblehead, a fea-port in the vicinity of Boston, vying in generofity with Salem, offered the Merchants' of that city the free rife of its wharfs and stores. The unparalleled injustice and cruelty of this Bill were the topics of universal execuation; it was faid "to be fo constituted, that enormous pains and penalties must ensue, notwithstanding the most perfect obedience to its injunctions; as the Port could not be again opened but by his Majesty in Council, in confequence of a previous certificate from the Governor. Those charged with the most aggravated crimes, are not punishable till arraigned before difinterested Judges, heard in their own defence, and found guilty of the charge. But here a whole people are accused, prosecuted by they know not whom, proved guilty they know not how, and fentenced to inevitable ruin."

The rough drafts of the Bills for altering the Charter of Maffachusetts; for the impartial administration of justice; and another for providing quarters for troops in America, arriving about this time at Boston, were instantly circulated through the Continent, and filled up what was before wanting of violence and indignation in the several Colonies. Even those who were moderate, or apparently wavering, now became resolute and resentful. The people at large expressed without reserve their conviction, that the zera was fast approaching when it would be necessary for them to defend their rights with the edge edge of the fword. The Colonial Militia Laws required every Citizen to bear arms within a certain age; they were in general fond of military exercises, and abounded in excellent marksmen. They were now with great diligence employed in training and perfecting themselves in military evolutions and manœuvres. The found of drums and fifes every where faluted the ear. Parents and children, husbands and lovers, the young and the old, were possessed by the same martial spirit, and were fired with the same glorious and enthufiaftic zeal for liberty. Nothing was to be feen or heard of but purchasing of arms and ammunition, casting of balls, and the making all those preparations which testify the most immediate danger and determined 'resistanice.

Soon after the arrival of General Gage, two additional regiments of foot, with a detachment of artillery and cannon, were landed at Boston, and encamped on the Common. These troops were by degrees re-inforced by the arrival of several regiments from Ireland, New York, Halifax, and at length from Quebec. The town of Boston is connected with the Continent by a narrow ifthmus of considerable length, on which a military guard was placed, and the entrance of the neck fortisted by order of Government; and so little intercourse substitute between the city and the country, country, that the garrison found it already difficult to procure the means of subsistence. With the Charter Bill, the Governor received a lift of thirty-fix Counfellors, appointed by Royal Mandamus, twelve of whom declined to ferve. The Courts of Judicature were totally suspended, the Jurors refusing to take the oaths, and to act under the new judges and laws. In many counties the people affembled in large bodies, and took poffession of the Court-Houses, and would suffer neither judges, sheriffs, nor clerks to enter. All persons accepting offices under the new Acts were declared enemies to their country. The Mandamus Counfellors, the Commissioners of the Customs, and all who had made themselves particularly obnoxious by their activity in feconding the meafures of Government, were compelled to take refuge in Boston. The Seat of Government at Salem was entirely abandoned, and Government itself seemed no longer to exist.

At length the General Congress, on which all America had their eyes now fixed, met at Philadelphia for the first time, September 4, 1774. This Assembly consisted of fifty-one Members, delegated in such proportions from the different Colonies as corresponded with their varied extent and population, though each Colony had a distinct and separate vote. Amongst their first resolves they passed an unanimous vote, that this Assembly deeply deeply feels the fufferings of their countrymen in the Massachusetts, under the operation of the late unjust, cruel; and oppressive Acts of the British Parliament; that they most thoroughly approve the wifdom and fortitude with which their opposition to those measures has been conducted; and they trust that the united efforts of America in their behalf will carry conviction to the British nation of the unwife, unjust, and ruinous policy of the present Administration. But if the late Acts of Parliament shall be attempted to be carried into execution by force, in fuch case all America ought to support the inhabitants of the Massachusetts Bay in their opposition. The Congress also published a Declaration of Rights, to which they conceived themselves entitled by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English Constitution, and their feveral charters or compacts. After a specification of these rights, and an enumeration of the recent violations of them, they mention, that in hopes of being restored to that state in which both countries formerly found happiness and profperity, they have for the prefent only resolved to purfue the following peaceable meafures, viz. to enter into a non-importation, non-confumption, and non-exportation agreement; and to prepare an address to the people of Great Britain, a memorial to the inhabitants of British America, and a loyal and humble petition to his Majesty. All thefe these different addresses and declarations were drawn up with great ability, prudence, and moderation. They call upon the people of Great Britain to witness their loyalty, and attachment to the common interests of the Empire; they appeal to their own acknowledgment of this truth, manifested by the reimbursement of large sums of money which they had advanced during the late war. with zeal far beyond their proportional ability. They then proceed to ftate and examine the meafures of Government, and the Acts of the British Parliament, which they confider as hoftile to America. They adduce strong arguments to shew that the final fuccess of the ministerial plans would in the end be as fatal to the liberties of Britain as to those of America. "Place us," fay they, "in the fame fituation that we were in at the close of the last war, and our former harmony will be restored." In the memorial to the inhabitants of British America, they deeply deplore the necessity which presied them to an immediate interruption of commerce, and apologize by faving, "We are driven by the hands of violence into unexperienced and unexpected public convulsions, and are contending for freedom fo often contended for by our anceftors." Towards the close they have these words: "We think ourselves bound in duty to observe to you, that the schemes agitated against these Colonies have been so conducted as to render it prudent that' that you should extend your views to the most unhappy events, and be in all respects prepared for every contingency."

But the Congress seemed to reserve their chief strength for the address to the King, which is penned with extraordinary force and animation, in many parts rifing to a very high strain of eloquence. They express their "confidence, that as his Majesty enjoys the fignal distinction of reigning over freemen, the language of freemen cannot be difpleafing:" adding, "Your royal indignation, we hope, will rather fall on those designing and dangerous men, who, daringly interposing themselves between your royal person and your faithful subjects, have at length compelled us by the force of accumulated injuries to disturb your Majesty's repose by our complaints." They assure his Majesty, that for the support of civil government, and the administration of justice, such provision has been, and will be made by the Colonial Legislatures as may be judged fuitable to their respective circumstances. They affirm, that for their defence, protection, and fecurity in time of peace, their Militias, if properly regulated, would be fully fufficient; and in case of war, his faithful Colonists will be ready and willing, as they have ever been when conftitutionally required, to demonstrate their loyalty, by exerting their most strenuous efforts in granting fupplies and raifing forces. They fay, «We

"We ask but for peace, liberty, and fafety. We wish not a diminution of the prerogative, nor do we folicit the grant of any new right in our favor. In the magnanimity and justice of your Majesty and Parliament we confide for a redrefs of our grievances, trufting that when the causes of our apprehensions are removed, our future conduct will prove us not unworthy of the regard we have been accustomed in our happier days to enjoy. And appealing to that Being who fearches thoroughly the hearts of his creatures, we folemnly profess that our counsels have been influenced by no other motive than a dread of impending destruction. We implore therefore your Majesty, as the loving father of all your people, connected by the same bands of law, loyalty, faith, and blood, not to fuffer the transcendent relation formed by these ties to be further violated in uncertain expectation of effects, which, if attained, never can compenfate for the calamities through which they must So may your Majesty enjoy every be gained. temporal felicity throughout a long and glorious reign, and your descendants inherit your prosperity and dominions till time shall be no more." It is difficult to conceive how this address could be read without exciting in the breafts, even of the most obdurate, ftrong emotions of compunction and remorfe; but there are those who have hearts and understandings upon which no impression can be Vol. II. made made by any effort of human reason, and who can resolutely "turn a deaf ear to the voice of the Charmer, charm he never so wisely."

In a subsequent address to the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Canada, the Congress with perspicuity and energy state to the Canadians the rights enjoyed under that Constitution from which by the late Act they are debarred. "These rights," fay they, "defend the poor from the rich, the weak from the powerful, the industrious from the rapacious, the peaceable from the violent, the tenants from the lords, and all from their fuperiors. They invite and folicit them to confult their own glory and welfare, and to unite with them in one focial compact. Your province," fay they, "is the only link wanting to complete the bright and strong chain of union. Nature has joined your country to ours, join also your political interests by an acceffion to the general confederation." But the fpirit of liberty was too faint and feeble in Canada, and the aristocracy and priesthood too powerful to admit of any confiderable effect from this The Congress having finished their deliberations, diffolved themselves after an uninterrupted fession of fifty-two days. Such was the noble and enthusiastic detestation of this Assembly to tyranny and flavery, that in one of their debates respecting the probability and danger of a rupture with Great Britain, a leading Member rofe up and faid. faid, "I should advise persisting in our struggle, though it were revealed from Heaven that nine hundred and ninety-nine were to perish in the contest, and one only of a thousand to survive and retain his liberty." The last resolution of this Assembly imported that another Congress shall be held the 10th day of May 1775, unless redress of grievances be obtained before that time.

General Gage had iffued writs for convoking the General Court of Maffachufetts at Salem on the 5th of October, which subsequent events induced him to recall; but the Court nevertheless met, and voting themselves into a provincial Congress, appointed a Committee to present a remonstrance to the Governor, complaining in ftrong terms of the late arbitrary laws, and the hoftile preparations making to enforce them. The Governor refused to recognize them as a lawful Affembly, and warned them at their peril to defift from their illegal and unconftitutional proceedings. To this requifition or menace little regard was paid, and at a fubfequent meeting a plan was drawn up for the immediate defence of the province; magazines of ammunition and stores were provided for twelve thousand militia, and an enrolment made of a number of minute men, so called from their engaging to turn out with their arms at a minute's warning. Winter approaching, the Governor was defirous of providing barracks and clothing for the foldiers, but no workmen could be procured, and the merchants returned for answer that they never will fupply any article for the benefit of men who are fent as enemies to their country. Every thing now ferved to increase the mutual apprehension and animofity. A magazine of powder at Charleftown, near Boston, had been seized by General Gage's order, and a battery of cannon spiked by a detachment from the shipping. On the other hand, the fort at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, was affaulted by an armed body of provincials, and after a flight refistance carried by storm, and the powder it contained was fent off in boats to a place of fafety. A fimilar spirit of retaliation and refiftance almost every where discovered itself. The refolutions of the Continental Congress were univerfally confirmed by the Provincial Affemblies or Conventions, and Committees of inspection and observation were appointed in order to enforce due obedience to the public decisions.

It is now necessary to revert to the state of affairs in England, where passion had during this interval sufficient leisure to cool, and the greatest anxiety began to prevail as to the result of the late measures of Administration. Lord Chatham, whose sentiments and feelings on all subjects of public concern must be regarded as peculiarly interesting, in a considential letter to a friend, dated August 1774, writes, "Every step on the side of Government.

vernment, in America, feems calculated to drive the Americans into open refiftance, vainly hoping to crush the spirit of liberty in that vast Continent at one successful blow; but millions must perish there before the seeds of freedom will cease to grow and spread in so savourable a soil: and in the mean time devoted England must sink herself under the ruins of her own soolish and inhuman system of destruction." In a subsequent letter he says, "It is plain that America cannot wear chains. Would to Heaven it were equally plain that the oppressor England is not doomed one day to bind them round her own hands, and wear them patiently!

Happily beyond the Atlantic this poison has not reached the heart. When then will infatuated Administration begin to fear that freedom they cannot destroy, and which they do not know how to love." And in a third letter, he says, "I have not words to express my satisfaction that the Congress had conducted this most arduous and delicate business with such manly wisdom and calm resolution as does the highest honor to their deliberations. Very sew are the things contained in their resolves that I could wish had been otherwise. Upon the whole I think it must be evident to every unprejudiced man in England, who feels for the rights of mankind, that America, under all her oppressions and provocations, holds forth to us the most fair and just opening for restoring harmony and affectionate intercourse as heretofore. I trust that the minds of men are more than beginning to change on this great subject; and that it will be found impossible for freemen in England to wish to see three millions of Englishmen slaves in America."

The PARLIAMENT, which had fat fix years only, was fuddenly and unexpectedly diffolved in the month of September, and a new Parliament immediately convened, which met on the enfuing 29th November 1774, and of which Sir Fletcher Norton, a Lawyer of great eminence, was unanimoufly re-chosen Speaker; for, this high office he had already occupied feveral years, in confequence of the refignation of Sir John Cuft. The King, in his opening Speech, acquainted the two Houses, that a most daring spirit of resistance and disobedience still prevailed in the Province of Maffachufetts Bay, and had broke forth in fresh violences of a very criminal nature; that the most proper and effectual measures had been taken to prevent these mischiefs, and that they might depend upon a firm resolution to withstand every attempt to weaken or impair the fupreme authority of this Legislature over all the dominions of the Crown." The Address proposed posed in the House of Commons produced a warm and animated debate. The Minister was reminded of the mighty effects he had predicted from the late Acts against America. They were to humble the whole Continent in the dust, and the punishment of Boston was to strike an univerfal terror into all the Colonies; that refractory town would be totally abandoned, and inflead of obtaining relief, a dread of the same fate. would even prevent the appearances of pity. An amendment being at length offered, that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to communicate the letters, orders, and instructions, relative to the execution of the late Acts, it was negatived by a majority of 264 to 73. In the House of Lords, the numbers on the division were 63 to 13; but a Protest against the Address, the first which had ever appeared on the Journals of the House, was figned by the Lords in the Minority; who, at the conclusion of it, thus express themselves: " It affords us a melancholy profpect of the disposition of Lords in the present, Parliament, when we fee the House under the pressure of so severe and uniform an experience, again ready, without enquiry, to countenance, if not to adopt the spirit of former fatal proceedings. But whatever may be the mischievous defigns, or the inconfiderate temerity which leads others to this desperate course, we wish to be F 4 known known as persons who have disapproved of meafures so injurious in their past effects and future tendency; and who are not in hafte, without enquiry or information, to commit ourselves in declarations which may precipitate our country into all the calamities of a civil war." Notwithstanding the high language of the Court on the first day of the Session, evident symptoms of irresolution in the Cabinet Councils were at this period discernible; and all discussion of the affairs of America were studiously avoided by the Minifter, in Parliament, previous to the recess. It was intimated only, that the apprehension of a war was wholly chimerical. The estimates were formed entirely upon a peace establishment; the land-tax was continued at three shillings; no vote of credit was required; the army remained on its former footing; and, what was most of all furprifing, a reduction of four thousand feamen took place from the twenty thousand voted last year-a circumftance which shews in the strongest light, how aftonishing was the delusion of the Ministry, or how eager their folicitude to delude the public. Lord Sandwich, First Lord of the Admiralty, publicly declared in the House of Peers, that he knew the low establishment proposed would be fully sufficient for reducing the Colonies to obedience. With unpardonable indifcretion he spake in terms the most contemptuous tuous both of the power and the courage of the Americans. He afferted, that they were neither disciplined nor capable of discipline; and that formed of fuch materials, and fo indisposed to encounter danger, their numbers would only add to the facility of the defeat." On the first day of the meeting after the recess, January 20th, 1775, Lord Dartmouth laid before the Peers, the official papers belonging to his department. The plan of Ministerial coercion was now finally fettled, not however, according to general report, without confiderable opposition in the Cabinet. from certain Members of the Administration, in the number of whom there was reason to believe that the First Lord of the Treasury himself, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Secretary of State for America, were to be accounted. Notwithstanding the continued infirmities of the Earl of Chatham, he had formed a resolution to attend the House, if possible, on this memorable day, in order, before the die was finally cast, to make one powerful effort to avert the calamity, the danger, and the ruin which he faw impending over that great Empire, which under his Administration had attained the summit of human prosperity and glory. The House was unusually full, and a most respectable and crowded audience also filled the space below the Bar. When he rose to speak, all was silence and prosound attention.

tention. Animated and almost inspired by his fubject, he feemed to feel his own unrivalled fuperiority. His venerable figure, dignified and graceful in decay, his language, his voice, his gesture, were such as might, at this important crifis, big with the fate of Britain, feem to characterize him as the guardian genius of his country*. "Too well apprized," he faid, " of the contents of the papers now at last laid before the House, he would not take up their Lordships time in tedious and fruitless investigations, but would seize the first moment to open the door of reconcilement; -for, faid he, every moment of delay is a moment of danger. As I have not, faid his Lordship, the honour of access to his Majesty, I will endeavour to transmit to him, through the conflitutional channel of this House, my ideas of America, to RESCUE him from the mif-advice of his present Ministers. America, my Lords, cannot be reconciled; fhe ought not to be reconciled to this country till the troops of Britain are withdrawn from the Continent; they are a bar to

* Such extraordinary powers of mind as were in this Nobleman, combined with so much corporeal infirmity, recal to recollection the anecdote of M. Voltaire, who, on a visit to the famous M. Turgot, when last at Paris, found the Minister wrapt up in gouty stannels and unable to move, "You remind me, said the Philosopher to the Statesman, of the image seen in Nebuchadnezzar's dream." "Ah!" faid M. Turgot, "the feet of clay!" "Yes, and the head of GOLD! the head of GOLD!" faid M. Voltaire.

all confidence, they are a fource of perpetual irritation, they threaten a fatal catastrophe. can America trust you, with the bayonet at her breast? How can she suppose that you mean less than bondage or death? I therefore, my Lords, move, that an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, most humbly to advise and beseech his Majesty, "that in order to open the way towards an happy fettlement of the dangerous troubles in America, it may graciously please his Majesty, to transmit orders to General Gage, for removing his Majesty's forces from the town of Boston." I know not, my Lords, who advised the present measures; I know not who advises to a perseverance and enforcement of them; but this I will fay, that the authors of fuch advice ought to answer it at their utmost peril. I wish, my Lords, not to lose a day in this urgent pressing criss; -an hour now lost in allaying ferments in America, may produce years of calamity. Never will I defert, in any ftage of its progress, the conduct of this momentous business. Unless fettered to my bed by the extremity of fickness, I will give it unremitted attention. I will knock at the gates of this fleeping and confounded Ministry, and will, if it be possible, rouse them to a sense of their danger. The recall of your army I urge as necesfarily preparatory to the restoration of your peace. By this it will appear that you are disposed to treat amicably amicably and equitably, and to confider, revise, and repeal, if it should be found necessary, as I affirm it will, those violent acts and declarations which have diffeminated confusion throughout the Empire. Refistance to these acts was necessary, and therefore just; and your vain declarations of the omnipotence of Parliament, and your imperious doctrines of the necessity of submission, will be found equally impotent to convince or enflave America, who feels that tyranny is equally intolerable, whether it be exercised by an individual part of the Legislature, or by the collective bodies which compose it. The means of enforcing this thraldom, are found to be as ridiculous and weak in practice as they are unjust in principle; conceiving of General Gage as a man of humanity and understanding; entertaining, as I ever must, the highest respect and affection for the British troops, I feel the most anxious fensibility for their fituation, pining in inglorious inactivity. You may call them an army of safety and of defence, but they are in truth an army of impotence and contempt; and to make the folly equal to the difgrace, they are an army of irritation and vexation. Allay then the ferment prevailing in America, by removing the obnoxious hoffile cause. If you delay concession till your vain hope shall be accomplished, of triumphantly dictating reconciliation, you delay for ever; the force of this country would 5 would be difproportionately exerted against a brave, generous, and united people, with arms in their hands and courage in their hearts—three millions of people, the genuine descendants of a valiant and pious ancestry, driven to those deserts by the narrow maxims of a superstitious tyranny. But, is the spirit of persecution never to be appealed? Are the brave sons of those brave forestathers to inherit their sufferings as they have inherited their virtues? Are they to sustain the infliction of the most oppressive and unexampled severity, beyond what history has related, or poetry has seigned?

Rhadamanthus habet durissima regna, Castigatque, auditque, dolos.

But the Americans must not be heard; they have been condemned unheard. The indiscriminate hand of vengeance has devoted thirty thousand British subjects of all ranks, ages, and descriptions to one common ruin. You may no doubt destroy their cities; you may cut them off from the superfluities, perhaps the conveniences of life; but, my Lords, they will still despise your power, for they have yet remaining their woods and their liberty. What though you march from town to town, from province to province, though you should be able to ensorce a temporary and local submission, how shall you be able to secure the obedience of the country you leave behind you, in your progress of eighteen hundred miles of Continent animated with the same spirit of liberty and of refiftance? This universal opposition to your arbitrary fystem of taxation might have been forefeen; it was obvious from the nature of things and from the nature of man, and, above all, from the confirmed habits of thinking, from the spirit of Whiggisin flourishing in America. The spirit which now pervades America, is the fame which formerly opposed loans, benevolences, and shipmoney in this country; the fame spirit which roufed all England to action at the Revolution, and which established, at a remote æra, your liberties, on the basis of that grand fundamental maxim of the Conflitution, that no fubject of England shall be taxed but by his own consent. What shall oppose this spirit, aided by the congenial flame glowing in the breaft of every generous Briton? To maintain this principle is the common cause of the Whigs on the other side of the Atlantic and on this; it is liberty to liberty engaged. In this great cause they are immoveably allied; it is the alliance of God and Nature, immutable, eternal, fixed as the firmament of Heaven. As an Englishman, I recognize to the Americans their fupreme unalterable right of property. As an American, I would equally recognize to England her fupreme right of regulating commerce and navigation. This distinction is involved in the abfiract.

ftract nature of things; property is private; individual, absolute; the touch of another annihilates it. Trade is an extended and complicated confideration; it reaches as far as ships can sail or winds can blow; it is a vast and various machine. To regulate the numberless movements of its several parts, and combine them into one harmonious effect for the good of the whole, requires the fuperintending wifdom and energy of the fupreme power of the Empire. On this grand practical distinction then let us rest; taxation is theirs. commercial regulation is ours. As to the metaphyfical refinements, attempting to show that the Americans are equally free from legislative control and commercial restraint, as from taxation for the purpose of revenue, I pronounce them futile, frivolous, and groundless. When your Lordships have perused the papers transmitted us from America, when you confider the dignity, the firmness, and the wisdom with which the Americans have acted, you cannot but respect their cause. tory, my Lords, has been my favourite study, and in the celebrated writings of Antiquity, have I often admired the patriotism of Greece and Rome: but, my Lords, I must declare and avow, that in the master-states of the world, I know not the People, or the Senate, who, in fuch a complication of difficult circumstances, can stand in preference to the Delegates of America, affembled in General Congress at Philadelphia, I trust it is obvious to your Lordships, that all attempts to impose servitude upon such men, to establish despotifin over fuch a mighty Continental nation, must be vain, must be sutile. Can such a national principled union be refisted by the tricks of office or ministerial manœuvres? Heaping papers on the table, or counting your majorities on a division, will not avert or postpone the hour of danger. It must arrive, my Lords, unless these satal Acts are done away; it must arrive in all its horrors; and then these boastful Ministers, in spite of all their confidence and all their manœuvres, shall be compelled to hide their heads. But it is not repealing this or that Act of Parliament; it is not repealing a piece of parchment that can restore America to your bosom; you must repeal her fears and refentments, and then you may hope for her love and gratitude. But now, infulted with an armed force, irritated with an hoftile array before her eyes, her concessions, if you could force them, would be fuspicious and infecure. But it is more than evident that you cannot force them to your unworthy terms of submission; it is impossible: WE ourselves shall be forced ultimately to retract; let us retract while we can, not when we must. I repeat it, my Lords, we shall one day be forced to undo these violent-oppressive Acts; they must be repealed, you will repeal them; I pledge myfelf felf for it, that you will in the end repeal them; I stake my reputation on it; I will consent to be taken for an IDEOT if they are not repealed. Avoid then this humiliating difgraceful necessity. With a dignity becoming your exalted fituation, make the first advances to concord, to peace, and to happinefs. Concession comes with better grace and more falutary effect from superior power; it reconciles superiority of power with the feelings of man, and establishes solid considence on the foundations of affection and gratitude. On the other hand, every danger and every hazard impend to deter you from perfeverance in the prefent ruinous measures; foreign war hanging over your heads by a flight and brittle thread; France and Spain watching your conduct, and waiting for the maturity of your errors, with a vigilant eye to America and the temper of your Colonies, MORE THAN TO THEIR OWN CONCERNS, BE THEY WHAT THEY MAY. To conclude, my Lords, if the Ministers thus persevere in misadvising and misleading the KING, I will not fay that they can alienate the affections of his subjects from the Crown; but I affirm, they will make the Crown not worth his wearing. I will not fay that the KING is BE-TRAYED, but I will pronounce that the KING-DOM IS UNDONE."

The motion of Lord Chatham was most ably seconded and supported by Lord Camden: "King, Lords, and Commons," said this great Constitutional II.

tional Lawyer, " are grand and founding names: but King, Lords, and Commons may become tyrants as well as others. Tyranny in one or more is the same: it is as lawful to resist the tyranny of many as of one; this has been a doctrine known and acted upon in this country, for ages. When the famous Selden was asked, by what statute refistance to tyranny could be justified? his reply was, "It is to be justified by the custom of England, which is a part of the law of the land." I will affirm, my Lords, not only as a Statesman, Politician, and Philosopher, but as a common Lawyer, that you have no right to tax America. No man, agreeably to the principles of natural or civil liberty, can be divested of any part of his property without his confent; and whenever oppression begins, resistance becomes lawful and "ight.".

The language of the Lords in Administration was high and decifive: it was declared, that the Mother-country should never relax till America confessed her supremacy, and obedience must be enforced by arms. Lord Gower, President of the Council, is reported, in addition to his menaces, to have said with an air of contempt and distain, "Let the Americans, so long as these measures are enforced, sit talking about their natural and divine rights, their rights as men and citizens, their rights from God and nature." In the result the motion was rejected by 68 voices against 18.

In the House of Commons, the American papers were, by motion of Lord North, referred to a Committee of the whole House, on the 26th of January 1775; previous to which, Petitions were presented to the House, from the Merchants of London, Briftol, Glasgow, &c. which, by an artifice characteristic of the present Ministry, were, on a division of 197 to 81 Members, configned to a separate Committee, to meet on the 27th of January, fo that the House must necessarily come to a final decision on the grand question before the Petitions were admitted to a hearing. This Committee was denominated therefore by the Opposition, the Committee of Oblivion. The ground on which the Miniftry justified this procedure was, that commerce and politics were matters totally diffinct, and that the House must decide on the question of peace and war folely upon political confiderations; but that duc care would be taken to fecure the commercial, interests and property of the Merchants whose Petitions were before the House. To which the Petitioners replied, "that they were under no apprehensions for their property, but from the meafures which might be adopted by that Honourable House, in order to secure it." The Petition from. the Congress to the King, having been referred by his Majesty, amidst the common mass of American Papers, to the House, the American Agents, Mr. Bollan, Dr. Franklin, and Mr. Lee, petitioned the G 2 House House to be heard at the Bar in its support. But the Ministers alleged, that the Congress was no legal body; and to hear evidence on the subject of their Petition, would be giving that illegal body fome degree of countenance:—that with respect to the pretended grievances alleged in the Petition, the House could hear the Colonies only through their legal Affemblies, and their Agents properly authorized; and that any deviations from this rule would destroy the whole order of Colony Government." To this the Opposition replied, "that the order of Colony Government was destroyed already in some places by Act of Parliament; in others by diffolution of Affemblies by Governors; and in others by popular violence—that the question was now, how to reftore it. That the Congress was furely an Affembly fufficiently legal for the purpose of presenting a Petition, which, as it was figned by all their names, might be received as the petition of individuals. That this mode of conftantly rejecting Petitions, would infallibly end in universal revolt: and indeed a refusal to hear complaints, feemed plainly to amount to an abdication of government."-These reasonings made no impression, and the Petition was in fine rejected by 218 voices to 68.

Thus did the British Parliament virtually resolve to devote three millions of British subjects to destruction unheard, and to carry fire and sword into the most flourishing flourishing provinces of the Empire, rather than deviate an iota from the established etiquette of precedent and punctilio. The great majority by which Lord Chatham's motion for the recall of the troops from Boston was negatived, did not discourage that Nobleman from perfifting in his exertions for reftoring peace to the Empire: and in the beginning of February he offered to the House of Peers a Bill for that purpose, under the title of "A Provifional Act for fettling the troubles in America, and for afferting the fupreme authority and fuperintending power of Great Britain over the Colonies." This Bill comprehended a vaft extent of matter, and, as the Noble Lord who prefided over the American department justly observed, many of its parts feemed to require much feparate difcussion; that it was impossible therefore to pronounce any immediate opinion concerning its propriety; that as the Noble Mover did not feem to press the House to any immediate decision, but rather appeared defirous that it should be fully and maturely weighed, he prefumed it would be agreeable to him, and he objected not to receive it, on condition that it should lie on the table till the American papers were first taken into consider-This appearance of respect and moderation feemed to move the indignation of the other Lords in Administration; and Lord Gower in particular reprobated it in the aggregate, and all its parts, with extraordinary asperity. It was affirmed by his Lordthip" that the Bill was irregular, unparliamentary, and unprecedented; that the matter should have been laid before the House in separate propositions; that it was objection sufficient to the Bill, that it fought reconciliation by concession; that it not only gave a fanction to the traitorous proceedings of the Congress already held, but by the appointment of another legalized their proceedings by Act of Parliament; that should their Lordships be base enough to betray the rights of Parliament, by adopting the provisions of this Bill, the Americans would only accept such parts of it as suited their own views, and would no doubt disclaim those that wore any appearance of fubmission. The duty on tea was affirmed to be only the pretext for the hostile conduct of the Americans, and that their real aim was to throw off all restrictions upon their commerce; that if the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Courts were circumscribed in the manner proposed by this Bill, the Navigation Act would become a mere dead letter; in fine, that this was no time for concession, and that to concede now would be to give up the point for ever. His Lordthip, therefore, gave it as his opinion, that the Bill should not be suffered to lie on the table."

Lord Chatham feeling, and highly refenting, the indignity now offered, entered into his own vindication, and that of the measure proposed by him, with all the fire and ardor of youth. "He was fenfible," he faid, " that this Bill contained only the rude outline of a plan of accommodation; that he had offered it to the House with a view of obtaining the affiftance of their Lordships, to render it effectual to the great ends to which it was ultimately directed. His Bill was framed on no narrow principle. He appealed to the candor of their Lordships, and deprecated the effects of factious spleen or blind predilection. He had been charged with precipitation in this bufiness; but under fuch circumstances of emergency, when a fingle day might decide the fate of the Empire, what was to be done? More than two months had clapfed fince the meeting of Parliament, and no plan of reconciliation had been offered by the Minifters; who, by their filence and inaction, feemed to acknowledge themselves incapable of devising any. No alternative then remained for him, but to fubmit to their Lordships his ideas on the fubject, or to abandon the interests of his country. But let Ministers avow that they have a plan, and he would instantly withdraw his Bill. By the indecent attempt now made to stifle this Bill in embryo, Ministers might hope that the contents of it would fink into filence and oblivion. though rejected here, it would, he trufted, ever remain a monument of his earnest however ineffectual endeavors to ferve his country. It would at least manifest how zealous he had been to avert the impending ftorms which feemed ready to burft over us, and overwhelm the Empire in ruin. He, acknowledged himfelf, on cool reflection, not indeed much furprifed, that men who hate liberty, fhould also hate those that prize it; that those who want virtue themselves, should persecute them who possess it. Since the first entrance of the present Ministers into office, he affirmed, that the whole of their political conduct had been one continued feries of weakness, temerity, ignorance, despotism, and corruption. In one view only did they appear found Statesimen and able Politiciansin a ffrict and unvaried attention to their own interest: such were their characters, and such their abilities, that no plan of Government could be expected to fucceed in their hands; and they themselves, he doubted not, were fully conscious that the adoption of any fystem of conciliation, founded on a wife and rational policy, would annihilate their power, and reduce them to that state of infignificance for which God and Nature had defigned them." The motion being put, the Bill was rejected by a majority of 61 to 32 voices.

The very day fucceeding this rejection, Lord North moved in the House of Commons, an Address to his Majesty, " to return thanks for the communication of the American papers, and to declare, that, having taken them into their most serious consideration, they find that a REBELLION at this time actually exists in the Province of Massachusetts Bay, which was affirmed to be the more inexcufable, from reflecting with how much TEMPER his Majesty and the Parliament have acted in support of the Laws and Constitution of Great Britain; and folemnly affuring his Majesty, that it is their fixed refolution, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, to support his Majesty, against all REBEL-LIOUS ATTEMPTS, in the maintenance of his just rights, and those of the two Houses of Parliament." A vehement debate enfined, and fome of the more moderate of those who had hitherto voted with Administration, feemed to feel a kind of horror at a proposition big with the most dangerous and direful confequences. It was affirmed on the part of the Opposition, that resistance to arbitrary measures was warranted by the Constitution; that no act of violence had been committed in Maffachufetts Bay, which was not equalled by fimilar acts in other provinces; that this partial declaration of rebellion, was only a branch of the general fystem of delusion—that there was no medium between a general war and a general reconciliation." On the other hand, the Courtiers infifted, that the boafted union of the Colonies would diffolve, the moment Parliament shewed itself resolved on measures of vigor and feverity. That it would not, however, they hoped, be necessary to punish universally, or to make examples of more than a few ringleaders of this revolt; and that when the Colonies should be reduced to due and entire submission to the laws and authority of Great Britain, their real grievances upon their making proper application should be redressed."

Several of the professional Members of the House affected to speak with the utmost contempt of the military prowess of the Americans; and one modern Alexander declared*, "that, at the head of five regiments of infantry, he would undertake to traverse the whole country, and drive the inhabitants from one end of the Continent to the other."

An amendment to the address was at length proposed by Mr. Fox, who had been in the course of the preceding session dismissed from his seat on the Treasury-bench for a spirit not sufficiently submissive, with circumstances of peculiar rudeness and indignity. Leaving out all but the preliminary words of the address, he moved to substitute after them the following: "But deploring that the information which the papers laid before them had afforded, served only to convince the House that the measures taken by his Majesty's servants tended rather to widen than to heal the unhappy differences between Great Britain and America, and praying an alteration in the same."

^{*} General Grant.

Upon a division, the amendment was rejected by 304 voices against 105, which was, however, a larger minority than had hitherto appeared on any question. Nor was it yet suffered to pass quietlyfor, on receiving the report, Lord John Cavendish, a nobleman whose principles were such as might be supposed affociated with, and were calculated to fustain the high honors of his name, moved for its re-commitment; on which a fecond debate, not less vehement than the former, took place, fters were warned that a future and bitter day of retribution would inevitably come, when they must answer to the JUSTICE of their Country for the mischiefs they had already done, and for the irretrievable ruin into which they were plunging the nation. "My head and my heart," faid the Noble Mover, "join in deprecating the horrors of a Civil War, which will be rendered still more dreadful by its involving in its certain confequences a foreign one with the combined forces of great and powerful nations." On the division the minority appeared to have gained fome little ground, the numbers being 288 to 106.

The next day a conference was, at the request of the Commons, held with the Lords, to propose their Lordships' joining in this address; and the President, Lord Gower, having made the report, the Earl of Dartmouth moved, that the blank which was left open in the address should be filled up by the infertion of the words-" the Lords Spiritual and Temporal." A debate equally violent with that in the House of Commons now enfued; a very wide scope of invective, no less than of argument, was taken by the speakers on both fides; and in the heat of controversial recrimination, affertion, denial, arraignment, and defiance, were, in a mode very unufual in that House, dealt in unsparing and pasfionate terms. To the aftonishment of the House, Lord Mansfield, who had ever appeared to harbor an inveterate enmity to America, declared, "that the imposition of the port-duties of 1767 was a measure the most absurd and pernicious that could be devifed, and the cause of all our present and impending evils." On which Lord Shelburne, at that time Secretary of State, Lord Camden, then Lord Chancellor, and the Duke of Grafton, then at the head of the Treasury, and now Lord Privy Seal, feverally declared, that they had no fhare in that measure, and had never given it their approbation. A general fentiment of amazement and indignation feemed for a moment to pervade the minds of the House, that a measure of fuch unparalleled importance should be carried into effect by the force of a fecret and overruling influence, contrary to the advice and judgment of the principal Ministers of the Crown, who were alone responsible for the measures of Government. The Marquis of Rockingham, who had petitions from

from the American and West India Merchants to present to the House, at length moved the previous question, in order that the allegations of the merchants might be heard before any decisive step was taken; but on the division it was negatived by 104 voices to 29; after which the original motion of Lord Dartmouth was put, and agreed to by the House: but on both questions strong protests were entered on the Journals of the House.

On the 10th of February, Lord North moved for a Bill to reffrain the trade and commerce of the New-England Provinces, and to prohibit them from carrying on the fisheries on the Banks of Newfoundland. This Bill excited fresh debates. It was faid, "that though a rebellion was declared only in one province, three more were included in the same punishment; that the Newfoundland fishery was necessary to the subsistence of the people of New-England; and that, by the operations of this cruel Act, half a million of people, including friends and foes, innocent and guilty, were condemned to perish by famine for the supposed offences of an inconsiderable number *. The Ministers contented themselves with alleging the political necessity of this measure, and it was carried through both Houses by the usual majorities. -While this Bill was pending, the friends of the Minister, no less than the Parliament, and the Nation at large, were thrown into fudden aftonishment, by his Lordship's announcing to the House A CONCILIATORY PROPOSITION. This famous motion, which was introduced by a long and elaborate speech, the Minister affirmed to be founded on that passage of the late address, which declared, that whenever any of the Colonies shall make a proper application to Parliament, we shall be ready to afford them every just and reasonable indulgence. The proposition itself, which wears an ambiguous and enigmatical appearance, was precifely as follows:-" That when the Governor, Council, and Affembly, or General Court of his Majesty's Provinces, or Colonies, shall propose to make provision according to their respective conditions, circumstances, and fituations, for contributing their proportion to the common defence, fuch proportion to be raifed under the authority of the General Court, or General Affembly of fuch Province, or Colony, and disposable by Parliament; and shall engage to make provision also for the fupport of the Civil Government, and the administration of justice in such Province, or Colony; it will be proper, if fuch propofal should be approved of by his Majesty in Parliament, and for so long as fuch provision shall be made accordingly, to forbear, in respect of such Province or Colony, to levy any duties, tax, or affessinent, or to propose any further duty, tax, or affestment, except only fuch duties as it may be expedient to propose for the regulation of commerce; the nett produce of the duties last mentioned to be carried to the account of fuch Province, Colony, or Plantation respectively." Though the intention of the Minifter, in the framing of this proposition, which there is good ground to believe the majority of the Cabinet most reluctantly affented to, was perhaps just and laudable, it could not be imagined by any person capable of enlarged or comprehensive views, that in the present state of things it would be attended with any beneficial effect. When the right of taxation was positively and vehemently denied by America, a mere offer on the part of Great Britain to suspend the exercise of that right; fo long as the Americans fhould tax themselves in the exact proportion, and for the precise purposes prescribed by Parliament, must, to the Americans, appear an absolute mockery. The Minister had the chagrin to perceive that the proposition was very indifferently received by the House. The gentlemen usually in opposition treated it as nugatory, infidious, and ridiculous. On the other hand, the High Prerogative Party, at the head of whom, and of the whole formidable phalanx of "King's friends," was Mr. Charles Jenkinfon, formerly formerly Secretary to Lord Bute; a man, dark, fubtile, and imbued with fentiments of loyalty and ideas of Government adapted to the meridian of the Court of Ispahan, violently exclaimed against this motion of conciliation, as a total abandonment of principle; as being in direct opposition to the spirit of the late address; as a contradiction to all the acts and declarations of Parliament; a virtual acknowledgment of injury; and a mean prevarication, which could tend to no other purpose than to facrifice the dignity of that House. They declared they would make no concessions to rebels with arms in their hands; nor agree to any terms of reconciliation, in which an express and definitive acknowledgment of the supremacy of Parliament was not a preliminary article. And a motion was actually made by Mr. Rigby for the Chairman to leave the chair.—In the midst of the tumult occasioned by this motion, the Solicitor General, Wedderburne, who had once been himfelf a leading Member of the Opposition, and who had rendered himself peculiarly odious by his apostacy, rose, in order to explain the nature and tendency of the proposition in question, which, he faid, had been exceedingly mistaken. He affirmed, "that it was far from the defign of the proposition to affent to a dereliction of the rights of Parliament, or to yield in any degree to the infolence of the Americans; but, on the contrary, it held forth a more wife and effectual method of enforcing the claims of the one, and repressing the arrogance of the other. The parliamentary right of taxation," he faid, "was fo effential a part of Sovereignty, that Parliament, if it would, cannot furrender it; and this right was expressly reserved by the proposition. Does it then suspend the profitable exercise of the right? So far from it, that it shews the firm resolution of Parliament to enforce the only effential part of taxation, by COMPELLING the Americans to provide what wE, not they, think just and reasonable. Thus it appeared that we were not contending, as fome had affirmed, for trifles, or a vain point of honor; but the dispute was at length placed upon its proper foundation-Revenue or No Revenue; and in default of an entire and unlimited compliance, he concluded with applying to America the famous denunciation, DELENDA EST CARTHAGO."-The Minister, who trembled at the idea of being left in a minority, gladly acquiefced in this very fatisfactory explanation; adding, in the genuine spirit of Machiavelian policy, that his motion was founded on the wellknown maxim, "Divide et impera!" that he had never expected the Americans would embrace this propofal, but that it was intended to difunite the Colonies, and unite the People of England. The Prerogative Party being now CONCILIATED, the question was put, and the numbers proved on the Vol. II. division H division 274 to 88. A fecond Bill was now brought in to restrain the trade of the Colonies of East and West Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, and the counties on the Delawar. The different parties in Parliament appearing almost exhausted with the satigue of incessant debate, this measure, unexpected and important as it was, passed with no memorable opposition.

On the 22d March Mr. Burke moved a feries of conciliatory propositions in the House of Commons, which he enforced by a most able and eloquent speech, fraught with wisdom and knowledge, clear, difpaffionate, and convincing; and in all respects worthy of a man of the highest reputation for genius and ability. He faid, "that his plan of conciliation was founded on the fure and folid basis of experience; that neither the chimeras of imagination, abstract ideas of right, or mere general theories of government, ought to be attended to. He confessed that he was not acquainted with the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people; and he affirmed, that government, to be beneficial, or even practicable, must be adapted to the feelings, habits, and received opinions of the people; that all schemes of government which had been or could be proposed, without due regard to these matters, would be found ineffectual and dangerous. Despotism itself must bend to fituations and circumstances. He disclaimed therefore all discussion respecting the question of right, and wished it to be considered solely as a matter of policy. Without enquiring whether they had a right to render their people miferable, he asked, whether it was not their interest to make them happy? and instead of taking the opinion of a Lawyer on what they might do, Mr. Burke thought it more confonant with reason, humanity, and justice, to confult what they ought to do in an emergency like the prefent. The Colonies, as they had hitherto been governed, were living monuments of the wisdom of our ancestors. The only method of governing them with fafety or advantage, was by admitting them to an interest in our Constitution, and by recording that admission in the Journals of Parliament, to give them as ftrong an affur--ance as the nature of the thing would allow, that we mean for ever to adhere to the fystem originally established. The idea of governing by force he reprobated as groß in its conception, uncertain in its effect, and ruinous even in its fuccess. In conformity to these principles, Parliament must revert to the antient constitutional policy of these kingdoms, which established taxation in America by grant, and not by imposition; which recognized the legal competency of the Colony Affemblies, for the fupport of the Civil Government in time of peace, and for public aids in time of war. In the course of his speech Mr. Burke mentioned the H_2 aftonishing aftonishing fact, that the exports from Great Britain to North America had increased from the beginning of the present century, when they amounted to five hundred and feventy thousand pounds, to upwards of fix millions annually." The purport of the resolutions, which were thirteen in number, went to recognize the legal competency of the Colony Affemblies for all the various purpofes of taxation; to acknowledge that this legal competency has had a just and beneficial exercise; that experience has shewn the benefit of their grants, and the futility of parliamentary taxation as a method of fupply. Others of the propositions related to the fettlement of an independent Judicature, the regulation of the Courts of Admiralty, and the repeal of the late coercive Acts of Parliament. The previous question being moved on the first proposition, it was carried in favor of the Miniftry by 270 voices to 78; and the remaining ones were with the fame facility evaded, or negatived without a division *. Another attempt was in a few days made by Mr. Hartley, a very respectable Member of Opposition, to effect an accommodation of this satal quarrel, by moving "that letters of requisition should be issued, agreeably to antient precedent, under authority of the Crown, with a view to procure a permanent and voluntary contribution from the several Colonies towards the general expences of the Empire:" but this was negatived without a division.

^{*} These propositions of Mr. Burke may be considered as comprising the mature and deliberate plan of the Rockingham party, for the restoration of the public tranquillity, to which purpose they were most wisely and happily adapted. The speech by which they were ensorced is by far the most valuable of Mr. Burke's productions; it can never be too much studied or admired. Of the speaker it can only be said, O si sic omnia dixisse!

At this period the City of London once more ventured to breathe her fruitless requests in the ear of Majesty, by an address, remonstrance, and petition, which was diftinguished by the remarkable circumstance of its being presented to the King by Mr. Wilkes, in his official capacity of Lord Mayor, to which civic dignity he had been elected at the close of the preceding year. In this remonstrance the citizens of London declared "their abhorrence of the measures which had been purfued, and were then purfuing, to the oppression of their fellow-fubjects in the Colonies. Not deceived by the specious artifice of calling despotisin dignity, they faid, they plainly perceived that the real purpose was to establish arbitrary power over all America. These measures, they affirmed, were carried into execution by his Majesty's Ministers, by the fame fatal corruption which had enabled them to wound the Peace and violate the Conftitution of this country. Your petitioners therefore, they fay, do most earnestly entreat your Majesty to difmifs immediately and for ever from your councils those Ministers and Advisers, as the first step towards a redrefs of those grievances which alarm and afflict your whole people."-The following answer was, in a tone of marked and unusual emotion, delivered from the Throne: " It is with the utmost astonishment that I find any of my fubjects capable of encouraging the rebellious difposition which unhappily exists in some of my Colonies in North America. Having entire confidence in my Parliament, the great council of the nation, I will fleadily purfue those measures which they have recommended for the support of the constitutional rights of Great Britain, and the protection of the commercial interests of my kingdoms."

Towards the close of the session the House resolved itself into a Committee, at the motion of the Minister, to consider of the encouragement proper to be given to the fisheries of Great Britain and Ireland. Bounties were granted to the ships from either kingdom employed in the Newsoundland or Greenland sisheries; Ireland was allowed to export tools and implements for the purposes of the sisheries; and by two resolutions not connected with the original motion, and intended as an additional douceur, it was rendered lawful, 1. to export from Ireland clothing for such regiments on the Irish establishment as were employed abroad; and by the 2d, five shillings per barrel bounty was allowed on the importation of flax-seed into that kingdom. But these trivial concessions rather excited the contempt than the gratitude of that long oppressed and long suffering nation.

On the 15th of May Mr. Burke presented to the House a paper styled, A Representation and Remonstrance from the General Assembly of New York. This province, accounted less disaffected than any other, and which in conjunction with North Carolina had hitherto refused an unreserved acquiescence in the resolutions of the Congress, had not been included in the late restraining Acts. But, at the fuggestion of the Minister, this remonstrance was rejected by the House, as containing claims inconfistent with the unlimited authority of Great Britain: - a fortunate circumstance for America, as this refufal completed that union which it was the policy, though in this inftance counteracted by the pride, of the Court to obftruct or diffolve. A memorial from the same body was at the same time presented to the House of Peers, by the Duke of Manchester; but their Lordships would not suffer it to be read, affirming, that the title of the paper rendered it inadmiffible; though it was observed by the Noble Mover, that the lowest commissioned officer in the service had an unquestioned right to present a memorial to the King; fo that it was not eafy to conceive how the term in question could militate against their Lordships' dignity. At length this extraordinary session was brought to a close, and the King was pleased to express from the Throne "the most perfect satisfaction in the conduct of his Parliament, and his entire conviction that the most salutary effects must result from such measures, formed and conducted on such principles." What these effects were, we must now turn our eyes to the Continent of America in order to ascertain.

All EUROPE faw with amazement the spirit of rafhness and folly which at this crisis reigned in the Councils of Britain, and which prompted her to treat with fuch unparalleled harfhness and difdain those Colonies which, in better and happier times, the had cherished with fond affection; and of which the might truly and proudly boaft, that as no nation had ever formed Colonial Establishments on principles fo liberal, no Colonies had ever, in fo fhort a period, attained to fuch profperity, or so amply rewarded the parental cares of the country from which they fprang. FREDERIC the Third, King of Pruffia, that great Monarch, who, combining in his own person the characters of the Hero, the Philosopher, and the Statesman, may be confidered as not inferior to any Sovereign who has ever fwayed the fceptre of any country, has left upon record, in terms very explicit and remarkable, his fentiments respecting the conduct and policy of the English Government in relation to America. "ENGLAND," fays he, "at this period, had involved herfelf in a war with her Colonies, undertaken in the spirit of despotism, and conducted in that of folly. It was Bute who still governed the King, and directed the Councils of the kingdom. Like one of those malignant spirits who are perpetually talked of, and never feen-he enveloped himself in profound darkness, whilst, by means of his fecret inftruments and emiffaries, he moved the whole political machine at his pleafure. His fystem was that of the antient Tories, who maintain the unlimited power of the Crown to be necessary to the public welfare. Haughty and harsh in his deportment, little solicitous as to the felection of the means which he employed in the accomplishment of his purposes, his obstinacy could be exceeded only by his indifcretion; a Civil Lift of one million fcarcely fufficed to gratify the venality of Parliament. The English Nation, DE-GRADED by its Sovereign, appeared to have no will separate from that of the Court. But, as if this was not enough, the Minister Bute engaged the King to attempt an arbitrary taxation of the American Colonies, at once to augment his revenues, and to establish a precedent which might at a future time be imitated in Great Britain. The Americans, whom the Court had not deigned to corrupt, opposed themselves openly to these imposts, fo contrary to their charters, their customs, and to the liberties which they had enjoyed uninterrupted fince their first establishment. A wise Government would have haftened to appeale these growing troubles, but the Court of London acted upon other principles. The rigor and violence of their proceedings completed the alienation of the Americans. A Congress was convened at Philadelphia, in which it was determined to shake off the Englifh yoke; and from this time we fee Great Britain engaged in a ruinous war with her own Colonies. France, the perpetual rival of England, faw with pleasure these civil commotions, and secretly encouraged the Americans to defend their rights against the despotism which George III. was defirous to establish, by holding out to them a profpect of future fuccours*." in the vicinity of Boston. The King's Speech, and the subsequent proceedings of Parliament, left no hope of accommodation; for the resolution and refentment of America rose in proportion to the arbitrary and oppreffive acts of Britain: and a fingle fpark only was now wanting to fet the whole Continent in a flame. General Gage, having intelligence of a confiderable magazine deposited at the town of Concord, about twenty miles diftant from Boston, where the Provincial Congress was also held, detached, on the night preceding the 19th of April, 800 grenadiers and light infantry, under the command of Colonel Smith, who proceeded on their march with great filence; but by the firing of guns and ringing of bells they at length perceived themselves discovered; and on their arrival at Lexington, at five in the morning, they found the company of militia belonging to that place drawn up on the Green; on which Major Pitcairn, who led the advanced guard, cried out, "Disperse, Rebels! throw down your arms, and difperse!" This not being immediately complied with, he ordered the foldiers to fire; eight or ten of the Provincials were killed, and the rest speedily retreated. The King's troops immediately marched on to Concord, destroyed such stores as they found, and spiked three or four pieces of iron cannon. On their return, the paffage of a bridge being disputed by a party of Provincials, a skirmish ensued, in which

which feveral men were killed on both fides; and the whole country being by this time alarmed, rose on all quarters, pressing close upon their rear, and a feattering and irregular fire was also directed against them from behind trees, houses, and hedges, which supplied the place of lines and redoubts. fortunately happened, that General Gage, apprehenfive of the danger of the fervice, had early in the morning ordered Lord Percy, with a fecond detachment equal in number to the first, and two field pieces, to march to Lexington, where they were joined in a fhort time by Colonel Smith, who would otherwise have found great difficulty in forcing his way back to Boston, his ammunition being entirely expended. As foon as the troops refumed their march, they were again haraffed and affailed in the same manner as before; and with great fatigue and great damage, they at length arrived about fun-fet at Charlestown, whence they croffed the harbor in boats to Boston, under the protection of the Somerfet man of war. In the different actions of the day, the lofs of the King's troops was estimated at near 300 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, while that of the Provincials did not exceed 90. Such was the inaufpicious commencement of this difaftrous war, and so ill did facts correspond with the boastful language of those BOBADILS, who at the head of a few regiments had threatened to carry terror through the Continent. The fword being once drawn, the Americans feemed determined to throw away the scabbard. In a few days after the engagement at Lexington, the Provincial Congress of Massachufetts resolved, that 30,000 men be forthwith raised, of which Generals Ward, Putnam*, Heath, and Thomas, were appointed to the command: and a great military force, collecting in the vicinity of Boston, formed the complete blockade of that important town.

On the 10th of May, 1775, the General Congress, regardless of the circular letter of Lord Dartmouth, forbidding, in the King's name, the election of Delegates, met at Philadelphia; and among their first acts were, Resolutions for raising a Continental Army, and establishing a Paper Currency; also a Declaration, That, by the late violation of the Charter of Massachusetts Bay, the compact between the Crown and that Colony was dissolved. The Colonies of New York and North Carolina now declared their fixed resolution to unite with the other Provinces in every effort to retain their just rights and liberties. The conciliatory proposition of Lord North being taken into confideration, it was unanimoufly rejected; and for this rejection, the Congress affigned their reasons at large and in a very mafterly manner. "If," fay they in their public declaration, "we accede to this propofal, we declare without refervation, we will purchase the favor of Parliament, not knowing at what price they will please to estimate it. We think the attempt unnecessary to raise upon us by force or threats our proportional contributions for the common defence; when all know, and themselves acknowledge, we have fully contributed whenever called upon to do fo in the character of freemen. We are of opinion, it is not just that the Colonies should be required to oblige themselves to other contributions, while Great Britain possesses a monopoly of their trade; this of itself lays them under heavy contributions. To demand therefore additional aids in the form of a tax, is to demand the double of their equal proportion. If we are to contribute equally with the other parts of the empire, let us equally with them enjoy free commerce with all the world."

^{*} General Putnam, who had ferved with reputation under Lord Amherst at the head of the Connecticut troops during the last war, had long since retired to a remote farm, which he cultivated with his own hands: and when the intelligence of his appointment was notified to him, he was found, like another Cincinnatus, in a leathern frock and apron, occupied amongst his laborers in fencing-in his land. Without a moment's hesitation he laid down his spade, and assumed the General's truncheon—within eighteen hours repairing to the head-quarters at Lexington, which was little short of an hundred English miles distant.

At the latter end of May, the Generals Howe, Burgoyne, and Clinton, arrived at Boston, with large reinforcements of troops; so that the entire force stationed in that place or its vicinity was now become very confiderable, not less than 10,000 men. A Proclamation was also issued by General Gage, offering a pardon, in the King's name, to all who should forthwith lay down their arms; excepting only from the benefit of this amnesty, Samuel Adams and John Hancock, who were destined to condign punishment. All those who did not accept of the proffered mercy were declared rebels and traitors, and martial law established till the Colony was reftored to the King's peace. No other notice was taken by the Congress, of this Proclamation, than to choose Mr. Hancock President of that Affembly. At the same time George WASHINGTON, Efq. was unanimoufly chosen General and Commander in Chief of the Continental Army. This gentleman had diftinguished himself early in life by his gallant exertions in the late war, particularly on the memorable day of the defeat of General Braddock; when, at the head of the Provincial militia, he covered the retreat of the regular forces, and prevented the total ruin of the Royal army. Since the termination of the war, he had refided upon his estate at Mount Vernon, on the banks of the Potowinac, a beautiful and romantic fpot fituated in the interior parts of Virginia, folely occupied in the arts of agricultural improvement and cultivation. His character for understanding; probity, and and patriotism stood in the highest degree of estimation. His personal accomplishments corresponded with those of his mind; and his countenance and figure were fingularly noble and engaging. No choice ever met with more general and zealous approbation, nor ever reflected in the event more honor on the judgment and fagacity of those by whom it was made. The new General fignified his acceptance of this high and arduous appointment in a very handsome speech, in which he modestly declared his incompetency to the command, which he flyled "a field too boundless for his abilities, and far, very far beyond his experience: but in obedience to the call of his country, he would, without hefitation, enter upon this momentous duty, and exert every power he possessed, in support of so glorious a cause; at the fame time informing the Affembly, that he would receive no pecuniary emoluments in compensation of his fervices." Horatio Gates, Efq. was appointed by the Congress Adjutant-General, and Artemas Ward and Charles Lee, Efgrs. first and fecond Major-Generals. The last of these officers was a man of extraordinary and eccentric genius, who had ferved with great reputation in Portugal and elsewhere during the last war. Passionately attached to the principles of Democratic Liberty, rather from a proud difdain of fuperiority, than from the pure and genuine ardor of benevolence, Vol. II.

on the prospect of a war with the Colonies, he had resigned his commission in the British army, and immediately offered his services to Congress, by whom they were gladly accepted; and on his military talents, skill, and experience, they justly placed very great dependence.

The English Generals, weary of their confined fituation, and feeling no doubt the difgrace of being with fo great a force blockaded by an enemy they had affected to despise, had formed a plan to poffess themselves of the heights of Dorchester, fouthward of the town: but, on the morning of the 16th of June 1775, they were greatly furprifed at the appearance of a redoubt breaft-work and entrenchment thrown up in the night on an eminence called Bunker's Hill, to the north of Bofton, on a peninfula divided by a narrow channel from that on which the town of Boston itself is fituated. A resolution was immediately taken to attack this post, from which they were liable to be fo much annoyed; and a detachment of 3000 chofen troops was immediately ordered on the fervice, under the command of General Howe. The troops afcended the hill with great refolution, but with flow and deliberate step. The Americans, under the direction of the old veteran Putnam, referving themselves till the British forces were within ten or twelve rods, then poured in an unexpected and furious fire, which fuddenly arrefted their progress, and threw them into great disorder. Being rallied by the exertions of their officers, they again advanced, till a fecond discharge again threw them into a fimilar confusion. The Generals Howe and Clinton, now placing themselves at the head of the troops, and for a time almost unsupported, led them on to a third attack; and the redoubt being now affailed on both fides, and enfiladed by the cannon from the ships and batteries, the Provincials were compelled to abandon their works, retreating across the ifthmus to Cambridge with inconfiderable lofs. But on the part of the British, not less than 1100 were killed or wounded, and amongst them 89 officers, who were particularly aimed at by the American riflemen. This was one of the warmest and most bloody conflicts ever known for the time it lasted, and the number of men engaged: and it was remarked, that at the battle of Minden, where the British infantry fustained the fire of the whole French army, the officers fuffered much lefs, and of privates the lofs was feareely greater. In the heat of the action, Charles-town, a fort of fuburb to Boston, situated on the opposite peninsula, and containing feveral hundred houses, was fet on fire by the British forces, and entirely confumed.

In the beginning of July, General Washington arrived at the head-quarters near Boston: he was received with all civic and military honors, and an Address of Congratulation was presented to him by the Affembly of Maffachusetts; in return for which he declared, that his highest ambition was to be the happy inftrument of vindicating the common rights of America, and of restoring that devoted province to peace, liberty, and fafety. The town of Boston, together with the post now occupied by the English at Bunker's Hill, continued to be closely invested; and though the American army was at this time extremely deficient in powder, ammunition, and military ftores of every kind, happily no attempt was made by the English Generals to molest them. The General Congrèss had, in the beginning of June, come to an important resolution, that the Colonies of America would not only continue to grant extraordinary aids in time of war, but also, if allowed a free commerce, pay into the Sinking Fund fuch a fum annually for an hundred years, as should be more than fufficient in that time, if faithfully applied, to extinguish ALL the present debts of Britain. But the intelligence at this period arriving of the prohibitory and other MAD ACTS of the British Parliament, it was not suffered to be entered upon the Minutes. Georgia having now acceded to the Confederacy, which from this time affumed the appellation of the Thirteen United Colonies; they iffued, in July, a Declaration, fetting forth the causes and necessity of their taking up arms. "WE

"WE are reduced," fay they, " to the alternative of unconditional fubmiffion or refistance by force; the latter is our choice. We have counted the cost of this contest, and find nothing so dreadful as voluntary flavery. Honor, justice, and humanity forbid us tamely to furrender that freedom which we received from our anceftors, and which our postcrity have a right to receive from us. We cannot endure the infamy and guilt of refigning fucceeding generations to that wretchedness which inevitably awaits them, if we basely entail hereditary bondage upon them." This Declaration was read at the head of every regiment, and received with great applause and acclamation. At the fame time, and as the last effort for effecting an accommodation, the Congress resolved upon a fecond Petition to the KING, which, though lefs eloquent than the first, was expressed in terms the most guarded, temperate, and respectful: and so flattering were the hopes conceived of its happy effects by those who fighed for the return of peace, that it received, by a fort of general affent, the appellation of the "Olive Branch." This Petition was transinitted to England through the highly respectable medium of Mr. Penn, proprietary Governor of the Province of Pennfylvania, and a lineal descendant of that famous and beneficent Legislator, in whose estimation the sword and the sceptre were equally superfluous, and in com-I 3 parifon parison with whom Solon and Lycurgus hide their diminished heads. "Attached," say the Petitioners, "to your Majesty's person, family, and government, with all the devotion that principle and affection can inspire; connected with Great Britain by the strongest ties that can unite societies; and deploring every event that tends in any degree to weaken them; we folemnly affure your Majesty, that we not only most ardently defire the former harmony between her and these Colonies may be reflored, but that a concord may be established between them upon fo firm a basis, as to perpetuate its bleffings, uninterrupted by any future diffenfions, to fucceeding generations in both countries; to transmit your Majesty's name to posterity, adorned with that fignal and lafting glory that has attended the memory of those illustrious personages whose virtues and abilities have extricated States from dangerous convulfions, and, by fecuring happiness to others, have erected the most noble and durable monuments to their own fame. We beg leave further to affure your Majesty, that, notwithflanding the fufferings of your loyal Colonifts during the course of the present controversy, our breafts retain too tender a regard for the kingdom from which we derive our origin, to request such a reconciliation as might in any manner be inconfiftent with her dignity or her welfare; and, the apprehenfions that now opprefs our hearts with unfpeak-unspeakable grief being removed, your Majesty will find your faithful fubjects on this Continent ready and willing at all times, as they have ever been, with their lives and fortunes to affert and maintain the rights and interests of your Majesty and of our Mother Country. We therefore befeech your Majesty, that your Royal authority and influence may be graciously interposed to procure us relief; with all humility fubmitting to your Majesty, whether it may not be expedient that your Majesty be pleased to DIRECT some MODE by which the united applications of your faithful Colonists to the Throne may be improved into a happy and permanent reconciliation." To this Petition, which Mr. Penn delivered into the hands of the Earl of Dartmouth, on the 1st of September, he was, after a short interval, informed, that " No ANSWER WOULD BE GIVEN!"

Sanguine hopes had been entertained by the English Court, that the inhabitants of Canada might be induced to take an active part in this war against America; and twenty thousand stand of arms were actually sent to Quebec, for the use of the Canadians. But a very general discontent pervaded the minds of the people on account of the late Bill; and the militia of the province, on being applied to by the Governor, General Carleton, abfolutely refused to pass the limits of it—declaring, that this was a quarrel which did not concern them, and in which they were determined to take no part. The disposition of the Canadians being thus ascertained, a project was formed for the invafion of that province, which, as no danger was apprehended, was protected by a very inconfiderable force. General Montgomery, with an army not exceeding 3000 men, being appointed to conduct this expedition, immediately proceeded to St. John's, fituated on the banks of Lake Champlain, before which he encamped on the 17th of September 1775. After a very gallant defence, that important fortress was furrendered on the 2d of November; Chamblée being also in the mean time captured by a feparate detachment. General Montgomery now pressed on to Montreal, which being deemed incapable of refistance, General Carleton quitted it with precipitation one day, and the American General entered it in triumph the next. Nearly at the time that these transactions took place, Ticonderoga and Crown Point were furprifed by an irregular band, haftily collected, of Green Mountain-men, and other inland fettlers, under the command of a bold partifan, styled by his followers Colonel Allen: and on the other fide Colonel Arnold, an officer of diftinguished courage and activity in the fervice of the Congress, after fuffering incredible hardships in traversing a rude and pathless wilderness during a march of thirtyone days, ascending by the Kennebeck, and descending scending by the Chaundiere, at length reached Point Levi, on the fouthern bank of the St. Laurence, where he expected the arrival of Montgomery. General Carleton was now reduced to a very critical fituation. Immediately on the evacuation of Montreal, he was conveyed in a boat with muffled paddles down the river to Quebeca precaution very necessary, as the Americans had by furprifing exertions made themselves masters of the navigation of the St. Laurence. The Governor now made every possible preparation for a vigorous defence. On the 1st December, General Montgomery joined Colonel Arnold before Quebec, the garrison of which confifted, including provincials and marines, of about one thousand fix hundred men. Notwithstanding the extreme feverity of the feafon in this inclement climate. General Montgomery immediately began erecting his batteries, which, by a perfect novelty in military feience, being compefed of fnow and water, foon became folid ice. But finding his artillery make little impression, he determined on a general affault; this was attempted in two different quarters of the town, the feveral divifions being commanded by Colonel Arnold and the General in person. In the first onset General Montgomery, leading on his men with undaunted resolution, was killed by a discharge of grape shot; and his troops falling into immediate diforder, were repulsed pulsed with much flaughter. On the other fide Colonel Arnold, by great exertions of courage, forced the first barrier; but before he could attempt the fecond, the whole strength of the garrison, in consequence of the catastrophe in the opposite quarter, was collected against him. Colonel Arnold himself received a dangerous wound in the leg by a musquet ball, and was compelled to retire to the camp. The Americans of this division, being now attacked both in front and rear, were, after a brave refiftance, at length obliged to lay down their arms, and furrender themselves prisoners of war. This was a very complete victory on the part of the Governor, whose skill and courage on this occasion merited every eulogium. Nevertheless, to fortune was he in a great degree indebted for his fuccefs, the fall of the American commander being absolutely decisive of the event. The character of General Montgomery, judging from the uniform tenor of his conduct throughout this memorable expedition, and from the united testimony of all America in his favor, could not eafily be cftimated too highly. To the courage of the foldier he joined the military skill of the general, and the virtues of the man. He is faid to have poffeffed a mind highly cultivated, and a person and address easy, graceful, and manly. He was of the number of those favored and exalted few, "whom both MINERVAS call their own." When

When his body was taken up, his features were not in the leaft difforted, but his countenance appeared regular, placid, and ferenc. He was interred with all military and funereal honors by the Governor, who had the magnanimity to efteem and acknowledge fuperior excellence even in an enemy. What appears most aftonishing is, that Colonel Arnold, with the shattered remains of his troops, now far inferior in number to the garrison, was yet able to continue the blockade of the city, and to reduce it to great diffress for the want of provisions.

It is necessary to cast a transient view at the state of affairs at this period in the principal provinces of the Continent. Lord Dunmore, Governor of Virginia, had adopted the refolution, in consequence of the disputes long subfifting between him and the people, and which rose by degrees to the greatest violence, to take refuge on board the Fowey man of war, in the month of June; to which he strangely attempted to transfer the fittings of the Affembly—a requisition with which the Legislative Body absolutely refused com-His Lordship being divested of his authority, carried on a fort of predatory war against the Province, proclaimed martial law, and immediate emancipation to all negroes and indénted fervants able and willing to bear arms in his Majefty's fervice—a measure which caused the greatest irritation irritation and refentment, without being productive of any adequate advantage. At length an event took place, which completed the alienation of the Virginians from the English Government. A demand was made by the shipping in the Bay of Chefapeak, to the inhabitants of the town of Norfolk, for provisions and other supplies for his Majesty's service; which being peremptorily refused, a heavy cannonade was commenced against the town, the richest and most flourishing in the province, and in a few hours it was reduced to ashes—the loss being estimated at three hundred thousand pounds. In the adjacent country of Maryland the wifdom and moderation of Governor Eden prevented these fatal extremities; and, when the British Government was at length entirely superfeded, he retired from the province, carrying with him the efteem and admiration of every party, and almost of every individual. In the Carolinas, Lord William Campbell and Governor Martin, adopting the policy of Lord Dunmore, were also compelled to withdraw for fafety on board the King's ships lying off the coast. Pennfylvania, a military affociation was established throughout the province; and a fimilar spirit, indicating itself in different modes, pervaded the whole chain of Colonies from the frozen deferts of Nova Scotia to the burning fands of Florida.

In the Maffachufetts Bay, the town of Falmouth, from fimilar causes of offence with that of Norfolk. was fet on fire, and deftroyed by a tremendous cannonade, in the course of which above three thousand fhot, befides bombs and carcaffes, were thrown into the place. The garrifon of Boston was maintained at an incredible expence by fupplies from England, a great proportion of which was intercepted by the American cruizers; and the town continued closely blockaded during the whole winter. Towards the end of February 1776, it was determined by General Washington to take possession of the heights of Dorchester, situated in a peninsula stretching into the bay to the fouth of Boston. All the previous preparations being made, a party of two thousand men, on the evening of the 4th of March, passed in profound filence the neck or isthmus, followed by three hundred carriages with entrenching tools. It being bright moonlight, they continued working till day-break, when two redoubts were completed, as if by the power of enchantment, to the inexpressible astonishment of General Howe, who was informed by the Admiral that he could not, while the enemy possessed those heights, be responsible for the safety of his Majesty's ships in the harbor. A refolution was immediately taken by the General, now chief in command by the departure of General Gage, to dislodge them: but a prodigious fform of wind, fucceeded by a deluge of rain, effectually prevented the meditated attack:

attack; and the works, having been nevertheless carried on in the mean time with unremitted diligence by the Americans, were now judged too ftrong to be carried by a coup-de-main, and it was determined to evacuate the town. Another work being thrown up, which from its proximity had the entire command of Boston-neck, this determination was most precipitately carried into execution early in the morning of the 17th of March 1776; when the whole of the troops, together with fuch of the inhabitants as were attached to the Royal cause, put to fea on board the transports lying in the harbor, though very infufficient in number for the purpose; and after a tempestuous and dangerous voyage they at length landed fafely at Halisax. On the succeeding day General Washington entered the town in triumph, and found there a great quantity of flores and provisions which the English commander had neither time to remove or to destroy. Compliments of congratulation were paid to the American General on this occasion by the Convention of Maffachusetts.

Some time previous to this event, the Oneidas and other Indian nations had fent a deputation, to that Affembly, of their chiefs and warriors, who, in the fimple ftyle of Indian eloquence, difclosed the purport of their commission in the following terms: "Brothers! we have heard of the unhappy differences and great contention between you and OLD ENGLAND. We wonder greatly, and are troubled in our minds. Brothers, possess vour minds in peace respecting us Indians. WE cannot intermeddle in this dispute between two brothers. The quarrel feems to us unnatural. You are two brothers of one blood; we bear an equal affection to both. Should the GREAT KING apply to us for aid, we shall deny him; if the Colonies apply, we shall refuse. We Indians cannot find or recollect in the traditions of our ancestors a case fimilar to this. Brothers, were it an alien that had struck you, we should look into the matter. We hope, through the wife government and good pleafure of God, your diffresses may be soon removed, and the dark clouds be dispersed. Brothers, as we have declared for peace, we defire you will not apply to our Indian brethren for affiftance. Let us Indians be all of one mind, and you white people fettle your disputes betwixt yourselves." Happy would it have been, had the Indian nations uniformly adhered to this wife policy, of which the Affembly to whom this discourse was addressed declared their high and entire approbation. But many of the favage tribes bordering on the great lakes and rivers were prevailed upon, by the folicitations and lavish presents of the British agents, to take up the hatchet in behalf of the GREAT KING. Colonel Johnson, son of the famous Sir William Johnson, was most successful in these diresul nego-· tiations:

tiations: and a great war-feast was made by him on the occasion, in which, according to the horrid phraseology of these barbarians, they were invited "to banquet upon a Bostonian, and to drink his blood."

The Parliament of Great Britain, after a short recess, met at Westminster, October 26, 1775; and the fession was opened by an unusually long and elaborate Oration from the Throne, containing charges against the Colonies the most wild and extravagant-accusing them of a desperate conspiracy, and of harboring a premeditated defign to effect a total revolt; whilft, taking advantage of the moderation and forbearance of Parliament, they hoped to amufe by vague expressions of attachment to the Parent State, and of loyalty to the Sovereign. "This rebellious war, it is affirmed, is manifefuly carried on for the purpose of establishing an independent empire; and it is now become the part of wifdom, and in its effects of elemency, to put a fpeedy end to these disorders by the most decifive exertions—for which purpose his Majesty had greatly increased his military and naval establishments, and he had also received the most friendly offers of foreign affiftance. When the unhappy and DELUDED MULTITUDE, against whom this great force will be directed, fhall become fensible of their error, he declared himself ready to receive the mifled with tenderness and mercy; mercy; for which purpose he had given authority: to certain persons upon the spot, to grant general or particular pardons and indemnities, and to receive the submission of any Province or Colony which should be disposed to return to its allegiance." Upon the whole, this speech breathed a most inveterate and determined spirit of animosity against the Colonies; and nothing less than absolute, unreserved, and unconditional submission was held out as the price by which peace was to be purchased.

During the fummer recess of Parliament, the Duke of Grafton, Lord Privy Seal, who had long viewed with extreme folicitude and concern the violent measures adopted by the majority of the Ministers, but who had been induced in a certain degree to concur with and countenance these proceedings by the most positive assurances of a speedy and peaceable termination of the controversy, now perceiving a bloody and unnatural war in full prospect, determined no longer to take any share of the responsibility attached to his exalted station. But thinking it proper, previous to his refignation, to make one more effort to procure a change of fystem, his Grace wrote, in the month of August, a letter to Lord North, expressing "his loyal and grateful attachment to his Majesty, and his zealous defire to fee the Government flourish under the administration of the Noble Lord to whom it was Vol. II. K now entrusted;" at the same time stating his own clear and decided opinion, the refult of much ferious reflection, that some effectual means ought to be adopted for the purpose of terminating our present unfortunate differences with America. His Grace remarked, "That the inclinations of the majority of persons of respectability and property in England differed in little else than words from the declarations of the Congress-That if Deputies from the United Colonies CANNOT be acknowledged by the King, other expedients might be devifed, by which the wifnes and expectations of his Majesty's American subjects might be stated and properly confidered That a want of intercourse had hitherto been, and must still remain, an insuperable bar to accommodation. His Grace observed, that the idea of a powerful party in America ready to avow their loyalty under the protection of a military force was now vanished. It is evident that, as the means of offence are increased, America has also in the same proportion increased her means of defence; that the event of such a struggle must be liopeless, difgraceful, and ruinous: and his Grace concluded his letter, written at this critical and perilous juncture, by fuggefting one mode at least by which intercourse and negotiation might commence, under a generous offer of a truce to the revolted Colonies, fanctioned by the address of both Houses to the King, on various motives of policy, affection.

affection, and humanity." To this letter the Duke received a polite and respectful, though very unfatisfactory answer from Lord North, upon the whole purporting that measures of coercion were unalterably determined upon.

On the receipt of the Congress petition, delivered to Lord Dartmouth by Mr. Penn, his Grace again renewed his folicitations with the Ministers for the adoption of a pacific fystem, but with no better effect. The Duke then, as the last resource, requested an audience of the KING, in which he stated to his Majesty, without reserve, his reasons why he could no longer take any part in the administration of affairs. The King liftened with attention, and condefcendingly endeavoured to demonstrate to his Grace, by calm and dispassionate reasoning, the justice, the policy, and necessity of this war, and the absolute certainty of ultimate fuccess; and finding that he was unable to effect the conviction he wished, he flatteringly expressed his regret at parting with so experienced and faithful a fervant.

On the usual motion in the House of Lords for an address in answer to the speech from the Throne, Lord Rockingham in the most pointed terms condemned the measures recommended in it, as bearing the most portentous aspect to the British empire, and fraught with the most ruinous consequences. The charge against the Colonies of aiming at independence his Lordship severely reprehended, as totally unfounded: "but what," faid his Lordship, "they never originally intended, we may certainly drive them to-they will undoubtedly prefer independence to flavery." The charge of making infidious professions of duty was equally reprobated. On the contrary, it was observed by his Lordship, that they had from the beginning declared, in terms the most explicit, that they never would fubmit to be arbitrarily taxed by any body of men whatever. They did not WHISPER their complaints, but fairly told the world what they would do if urged to extremity. What, his Lordfhip asked, was that lenity of Parliament so much boasted of in the speech? Was it to be discovered in the Boston Port Bill? in the Fishery Bill? in the Maffachufetts Charter Bill? or in the indemnity and encouragement held out to military license in the Bill which professes as its object the impartial administration of justice? Ministers, said his Lordship, have been warned fession after session of the danger in which they were involving themfelves and the country; but the fources of information which Ministers relied upon were the false, partial, illiberal representations of felfish, artful, and defigning men, who had held public offices in America, and who by this means were glad to gratify at once their interest, their prejudices, and their revenge. His Lordship concluded an excellent speech by moving an amendment to the address address—" That, deeply impressed with the melancholy state of public concerns, they would on mature deliberation endeavour to apply the most effectual means of restoring order to the distracted affairs of the British empire, &c."

The Duke of Grafton now rose to support the amendment, and in a particular manner attracted the attention of the House and of the Public, by an open and ingenuous acknowledgment that he had by mifinformation and mifreprefentation been induced to give countenance to a plan the most abhorrent from his mind and opinion-being repeatedly affured that the mere appearance of coercion would fuffice to establish a perfect reconciliation. His Grace declared, that he could no longer hefitate as to the part he ought to take, being now fully convinced, that nothing less than a total repeal of the American laws passed since the year 1763, could restore peace and happiness, or prevent those fatal confequences which he could not even think of without grief and horror. Such, he faid, was the strength of his conviction, that no personal confideration whatever could induce him to refrain from giving his most determined opposition to the measures actually pursued, and to those which he understood were yet in contemplation. After a long and vehement debate, the amendment of Lord Rockingham was rejected by 69 voices to 29, and the original motion, on a fecond division, carried by 76 voices to 33. But the Lords in the minority entered upon the Journals a most spirited and vigorous protest against it. "We have beheld with forrow and indignation," say their Lordships, "freemen driven to resistance by acts of oppression and violence. We cannot consent to an address which may deceive his Majesty and the Public into a belief of the considence of this House in the present Ministry, who have disgraced Parliament, deceived the Nation, lost the Colonies, and involved us in a civil war against our clearest interests, and upon the most unjustifiable grounds, wantonly spilling the blood of thousands of our fellow subjects."

On the refignation of the Duke of Grafton, Lord Dartmouth, whose mild temper was ill calculated to enforce the prefent bloody and coercive meafures, was advanced to the dignity of Lord Privy Seal; and Lord George Germaine, fo famous, or rather infamous, under his former appellation of Lord George Sackville, who, after a long course of opposition, had uniformly voted with the Court on the questions relative to America, was appointed to the vacant post of Secretary of State for the Colo-The most odious of tasks was now therefore properly affigned to the most odious of instruments. Lord Rochford also at this time choosing to retire from public business, the Earl of Weymouth was reinstated in the office of Sccretary for the Southern Department, refigned by his Lordship in the year 1771. The debate on the address in the House of Commons was chiefly diftinguished from that of the Lords by the high offence which feemed to be taken by many of the Country Gentlemen, and fome other Members who usually voted with the Administration, at that clause in the speech from the Throne in which his Majesty mentioned the introduction of a body of his electoral forces into the garrifons of Port Mahon and Gibraltar; and the corresponding clause in the address, thanking his Majesty for the same. This was, not without reason, represented as a measure in the highest degree unconftitutional and dangerous; and, the Minister not seeming very willing to give any fatiffaction on this head, many gentlemen left the House without voting. On the report, the opposition was renewed with fresh vigor; and a motion being now formally made by one of the Country Members for inferting in lieu of the obnoxious clause, the words, "And we will immediately take into our confideration the measure of introducing foreign troops into any part of the dominions of Great Britain without the previous confent of Parliament;" the Minister began to see the necesfity of making fome concession; and, quitting the high but unfure ground of authority, he now declared, "that though he believed the measure to be right, as other gentlemen for whom he had the highest deserence seemed to be of another opinion, he had no objection that the matter should be brought in a regular and parliamentary manner before the House, that its advisers might, if the necessity of the case required it, receive the benefit of an Act of Indemnity." This acknowledgment brought back the deserters to the Ministerial standard, and the address finally passed by a great majority. In the sequel, a Bill of Indemnity was actually brought into the House of Commons, and passed with general approbation; but after great debate it was, little to the satisfaction of the Public, rejected by the Lords.

On the 10th of November, 1775, the Duke of . Richmond moved for the examination of Mr. Penn at the bar of the House of Lords, to which the Peers in Administration gave a very reluctant affent. In the course of this remarkable examination, it appeared, that no questions had been asked of Mr. Penn, or any enquiry made by Ministers fince his arrival in England, although he had been Governor of the Colony in which the Congress held their fession, and was held in universal esteem as a man of great candor, ability, and information. He declared his firm belief, "that the Congress had hitherto entertained no defigns of independency; that the members of that Affembly were men of character, fairly elected, and fully competent to declare the fense of their Constituents; that the different Provinces would certainly be governed by their decisions; that the war was levied and carried on by their Colonists, merely in defence of what they conceived to be their undoubted rights and liberties; that the spirit of resistance was general, and that they believed themselves able to defend their liberties against the arms of Great Britain; that the Colonies had been greatly diffatisfied with the reception of their former petitions, but had formed great hopes on the fuccess of that brought over by him, which was ftyled by them "The Olive Branch," and that he had been congratulated by his friends upon his being the bearer of it: that it was greatly to be feared, that, if conciliatory measures were not speedily pursued, they would form connections with foreign powers, and that fuch connections, once made, it would be found very difficult to diffolve. He affirmed, " that the prevailing wish of America was restoration of friendship with England; but that the most intelligent men on the Continent were of opinion, that a rejection of the prefent petition would prove an infuperable bar to reconcilement. He faid, that the Americans were well fatisfied with the repeal of the Stamp Act, notwithstanding the declaratory law which accompanied it; and if no innovations had been afterwards made, they would have remained content; that they would allow the imperial authority of Great Britain, but not its right of taxation." The examination being finished, Petition from the Continental Congress to the King was ground for a conciliation of the unhappy differences substituting between Great Britain and America." After a violent debate, the motion was negatived by 86 to 33 voices.

The Minister having moved in the House of Commons, that the land-tax for the year 1776 be four shillings in the pound, the Country Gentlemen were congratulated by the Members in Opposition on this additional taxation, as the first fruits of their darling scheme for the coercion of America; and it was predicted, that below the prefent level the land-tax would NEVER AGAIN BE The Country Members, irritated equally by the increase of the tax and the bitter farcasms by which it was accompanied, and displeafed also with the language now held by Lord North, "that the contest was not for taxation but for fovereignty," declared through the medium of their leaders, that they had supported Government in its plans of coercion, in the firm perfuafion that their burthens would be eventually diminished by a great revenue to be drawn from America; but if the idea of a revenue were abandoned, they could not think of expending any more money in a contest attended with so many evils, and wholly unproductive of benefit; and they would therefore oppose the Noble Lord's motion for the increase of the

the land-tax. The Minister, who was a great adept in the art of accommodation, and perfectly skilled in the science of Government within the walls of that House, instantly perceived the necessity, as at other times, and on other favorite points, of conciliating this occasionally obstinate and refractory class of Members. He now therefore affured them, "that the idea of taxation, and of levying a productive revenue from America, was never abandoned; and that, when any thing of that fort was affirmed, nothing more was meant than that it was dropped for the present; taxation being a matter of fecondary confideration only, when the supremacy of the country was at stake. He even declared, that no means existed by which the legislative authority and commercial control of this country over the Colonies could be infured, but by combining them with taxation." explanation giving much fatisfaction, the motion was carried by a great majority; and thus were these credulous and honest gentlemen, the loyal and zealous DE CoverLeys of the House, led to believe, that a war carried on at fo enormous and uncalculable an expence, was a war founded on the economical principle of reducing taxes and diminishing burdens; though it is remarkable, that the most fanguine ideas of Mr. Grenville himfelf never extended to the expectation of extorting a revenue from America equal in amount to the interest interest of the loan already wanting, and which it would be annually necessary, under increasing difficulties and disadvantages, to raise, in order to establish a claim which was now declared to be the object of the contest.

In the course of this month (Nov. 1775) a feries of motions made in the Upper House by the Duke of Grafton, for estimates to be laid before the House respecting the state of the army in America, and the addition of force necessary for the fervice of the enfuing campaign, were negatived without a division. Parliament was left to wander in darkness and uncertainty, on pretence of the danger of giving any information that might reach the enemy. On the day succeeding this rejection, Mr. Burke moved for leave to bring in a Bill " for quieting the prefent troubles in America," which was profeffedly founded on the famous statute passed in the 35th year of Edward I. known by the name of Statutum de tallagio non concedendo. He justly observed, "that Sovereignty was not in its nature an idea of abfolute unity, but was capable of great complexity and infinite modifications, according to the temper of those who are to be governed, and to the circumstances of things; which being infinitely diversified, Government ought to be adapted to them, and to conform itself to their nature, instead of vainly endeavouring to force that to a contrary bias; that the

the Grand Seignior himself could not exercise his authority in the same manner, or the same degree, at Algiers or Tunis as at Constantinople; and that circumstances not in our power to alter or control, made concession on the subject of taxation indispensably essential to the attainment of peace. Nothing worse, said this famous Parliamentary Orator, happens to you than to all nations possessing extensive empires. In large bodies the circulation of power must be less vigorous at the extremities. Despotism itself is compelled to truck and buckfter. Three thousand miles of ocean is a powerful principle in the natural conftitution of things for weakening Government, of which no contrivance can destroy the effect. Spain in her American provinces submits to this immutable condition, the eternal law of extensive and detached empire. A Power steps in, which limits the arrogance of the raging passions, and says, Hither shalt thou go, and no farther. Who are you, that you should fret and rage, and bite the chain of nature? Such effects are incident to all the forms into which empire can be thrown. The great object of the present Bill, he faid, was a renunciation of the exercise of taxation without at all interfering with the question of right; it prescreed the power of levying duties for the regulation of commerce; but the money so raised agreeably to an excellent idea fuggefted by the conci-conciliatory motion of Lord North, was to be at the disposal of the several General Assemblies. The tea duty of 1767 was to be repealed, and a general amnesty granted." This was a wife, fimple, and rational plan of conciliation; and it met with a less unfavourable reception from the House than any hitherto attempted: but on a division upon the previous question, the numbers were 210 against 105 who voted in support of the original motion.

In a few days after this, the Minister brought in his famous Prohibitory Bill, interdicting all trade and intercourse with the Thirteen United Colonies. By this Bill, all property of Americans, whether of ships or goods on the high seas, or in harbor, are declared forfeited to the captors; fo that it amounted in fact to an absolute declaration of war. This, the Opposition justly affirmed, was cutting off at the root all hope of future accommodation; and they pronounced it to be a formal ACT OF ABDICATION of our Government over the Colonies; it drove the two countries to the fatal extremity of absolute conquest on the one fide, or absolute independency on the other. The offers of pardon, by which the Bill was accompanied, were faid to be ridiculous when offered to men who acknowledge no crime, and who are conscious not of doing, but merely of fuffering, wrong. The repeal of the Boston Port, Fishery, and Restraining ing Acts being included in this Bill, as entirely fuperfeded by the operation of it; Mr. Fox moved an amendment, to leave out the whole title and body of the Bill excepting the parts relative to fuch repeal. This produced a warm debate, which continued till midnight, when the amendment was rejected by a majority of 192 to 64 voices.

In the House of Lords, the Bill was again combated on every ground of policy, humanity, and justice. Lord Mansfield in the course of the debate remarked, "that we had passed the Rubicon, and were not now at liberty to confider the queftions of original right or wrong, justice or injustice. We were engaged in a war, and we must use our utmost efforts to obtain the ends proposed by it;" quoting in illustration the laconic speech of a gallant officer ferving in the army of Gustavus Adolphus, who, pointing to the enemy, faid to his men, "See you those lads? KILL them, or they will KILL you." Such were the abominable arguments now used to reconcile the minds of men to this unjust, 'cruel, and bloody war, by venerable and learned fages wearing the robes and holding the balance of Justice. The Bill, after much objection and opposition, passed by a great and decifive majority.

The only notice taken of the conciliatory proposition of the Minister was by the Assembly of Nova Scotta, which had transmitted a Petition to Parliament, presented to the House on the first day of the Session, by the Speaker, sounded on the basis of that proposition; and it was now moved by Lord North, that the proposal of a poundage duty ad valorem upon all commodities imported, not being the produce of the British dominions in Europe or America, to be disposed of by Parliament, should be accepted, and the duty fixed at eight per cent. in lieu of all other taxes; and in reward of this dutiful overture, the Act of Navigation itself was in part dispensed with in their favor, and they were allowed to import ORANGES and LEMONS, and fome other articles of equal importance, directly from the place of their growth and produce. But as this barren province was notoriously unequal to the support of its own civil government, the offer of a revenue feemed to carry with it fo ludicrous an appearance, that no Bill was ever in the fequel brought forward in confequence of the resolutions

A very extraordinary proposition had been recently made by the Earl of Harcourt, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to the Parliament of that kingdom, on the part of his Majesty, who had pledged his royal word that twelve thousand regular troops on that establishment should always remain stationary in that country; requesting four thousand of the said troops to be employed in the service vice of Great Britain, and engaging that Ireland fhould be relieved from the expence of the faine; and Also, that the faid troops should be replaced, if defired, by four thousand foreign Protestant troops, to be likewife paid by Great Britain. Soon after the Christmas recess, a motion was made in the English House of Commons, by Mr. Thomas Townfhend, "that the Earl of Harcourt was herein chargeable with a breach of privilege, and had acted in derogation of the authority of that House, and that a Committee be appointed to enquire into the fame. It was urged, that it was the highest prefumption in the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to engage for the payment of any specific sums by the Parliament of Great Britain; and much worse to pledge the Parliament to the fulfilment of a contract fo abfurd and extravagant as to defray the expence of eight thousand men for the service of four thousand; and the design of introducing foreign troops into Ireland, was represented as fraught with danger and mischief." The Minister appeared not a little embarrafied on this occasion; and contented himself with faying, "that he was in no shape responsible for the conduct or actions of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and he difavowed any knowledge of the specific instructions under which this requisition had been made. He allowed that the bargain appeared improvident, but it might be defended on the ground of neces-Voi. II. L fity:

fity; and if it were allowed to be more eligible to employ native troops than foreigners in America, it would be a fufficient justification of the latter part of the proposition." Mr. Jenkinson, however, and others of the King's friends, who took part in the debate, assumed a much higher tone, and infifted upon his Majesty's RIGHT of introducing foreign forces into any part of his dominions, when the exigencies of the State rendered it expedient or necessary. Mr. Jenkinson afferted, "that the Meffage was worded in a manner perfectly agreeable to official usage, and that the meafure was in exact conformity with, or more properly constituted a part of, that antient and acknowledged prerogative, by which the Crown raifed troops of its own will, and then applied to Parliament for the payment, or entered into treaties for the same purpose with foreign princes, and pledged the national faith for a due performance of the articles." That part of the motion which went to the appointment of a Committee of Enquiry was negatived by 224 to 106 voices, and the previous question put on the clause of censure, which was carried without a division. Not discouraged by the ill fuccess of former attempts, Mr. Fox, on the 20th of February 1776, moved, "That it be referred to a Committee, to enquire into the ill fuccess of his Majesty's arms in America." The vigour and comprehension of mind, the determined mined resolution, the open and magnanimous disposition of this Senator, mature in judgment, though immature in years—excited hopes and expectations of eventual advantage to his country, which the malignant genius of Britain has hitherto delighted to disappoint. "Declining," he faid, "at present to enter into the development of a system whose principles and complexion afforded the clearest and most unequivocal proofs that its ultimate defign was the TOTAL DESTRUC-TION of the constitution; he grounded his motion on the acknowledged fact, that there had been fomewhere gross ignorance, incapacity, or negligence. This must be imputed either to our Ministers at home, or our Commanders abroad: and it was abfolutely necessary that the House fhould be fully informed on the fubject, in order that a remedy might be applied to the evil before the nation fell a victim to the treachery or mifconduct of men, on the one hand as unfit to deliberate and determine, as on the other to carry the measures so determined into execution. Public justice demanded such an enquiry. None but the guilty could wish to evade it. Our Commanders by fea and land ought not to fuffer the difgrace attached to ill fuccess, in order to hide or palliate the blunders, the follies, the shameful and wretched inability of others." The Administration appeared much chagrined and mortified at this exposure of their weakness. It was acknowledged "that ill success had hitherto attended the operations of the war, but that more vigorous measures would now be pursued; that a change of the former lenient system had been announced from the Throne; and it would be highly disrespectful and improper to enter into the examinations proposed, until the measures now resolved upon were tried, and the event known." The previous question being put at three o'clock in the morning, the motion was rejected by a majority of 240 to 104.

The treaties recently entered into by his Majesty with the Landgrave of Hesse, the Duke of Brunfwick, &c. for hiring large bodies of their troops: for the American fervice, amounting to about eighteen thousand men, having been laid before the House, and a motion made by the Minister for referring them to a Committee of Supply, a vehement debate enfued. "Great Britain, it was faid, was now difgraced in the eyes of all Europe-She was to be impoverished, and what was ftill worfe, degraded by an humiliating application to the petty Princes of Germany for fuccors to enable her to fubdue her own fubjects. Such alfo were the extravagant terms on which thefe troops were obtained, that the use of 18,000 mercenaries would not, taking in all contingencies, cost the nation less than one million and a half fterling. There were no limits to the extortion of thefe these princely butchers, who fold their subjects like fo many beafts for the flaughter. They were to have levy-money; they were to have a double fubfidy; their corps were to be kept up complete; they were to be paid till the troops returned to their respective countries, and the subsidies were to be continued two years after the performance of the fervice." In answer to these objections, the Ministers alleged, that the terms were more reasonable, confidering the distance and other disagreeable circumstances attending this novel fervice, than could be expected; that had they been ftill higher, necessity would have justified compliance. It was intimated, that fo great a force would be employed, that these troops would have Little more to do than to flew themselves in America and return: that there was every reason to believe that the war would be terminated in a fingle campaign, in which case the terms would be found very advantageous: if indeed it should be protracted to a diffant period, it was allowed that the expence would be enormous; but this was fo improbable as to merit little confideration. The question was carried by the force of these reasonings in favor of the Court, by a majority of 242 to 88 voices.—The fame question was difcuffed with equal warmth in the House of Peers, in confequence of a motion of the Duke of Richmond, for an Address to the King, "That his Majesty would be pleased to countermand the L 3 march march of these troops;" and the Duke of Cumberland, who had for some time past, as well as the Duke of Glocester, voted in the minority, "lamented that Brunfwickers, once the advocates of Liberty in Europe, should now be fent to subjugate it in America." The division was in this House no less in favor of the Ministers than in that of the Commons; the numbers, on putting the question, being 100 to 32. On a demand unexpectedly made by the Secretary of War for the fum of 845,000l. for Army Extraordinaries, all the ardor of the Opposition revived. They demonstrated, by a reference to the Journals, that neither the glorious campaign of 1704, which faved the German Empire, nor that of 1760, which was crowned by the conquest of Canada, had in any degree equalled the expence of the difgraceful campaign of the last year. Blenheim and Schellenburg were opposed to Lexington and Bunker's Hill; and the river Mystic ludicrously contrafted with the Rhine and the Danube. The Ministers, apparently overwhelmed with a torrent of wit, argument, and invective, relied on this occasion much more fecurely on the strength of their numbers than their cause, and the question on a division was carried by a majority of 180 to 57.

On the 14th of March, 1776, a very important motion was made by the Duke of Grafton, "for an Address

Address to the King, that in order to prevent the farther effusion of blood, a proclamation might be iffued, declaring, that if the Colonies shall prefent a Petition to the Commissioners appointed under the late Act, fetting forth what they confider to be their just rights and real grievances, that in fuch a case his Majesty will consent to a fuspension of arms; and that affurance shall be given them, that their Petition shall be received, confidered, and answered," This motion was defigned and wifely calculated to fupply the palpable deficiency of the late Commission, which empowered the Commissioners merely to grant pardons on submission, holding out by these means a mere delufive flow of peace, without furnishing the means indispensable to its attainment. The Noble Mover observed, "that the adoption of the prefent motion, or of fomething equivalent to it, exclusive of the evident reasonableness of the thing, feemed to be rendered at this time absolutely neceffary by two circumstances, to which his Grace particularly called the attention of the House. The first was, the doctrine of unconditional SUBMISSION, fo much infifted upon in the other House by the Noble Lord at the head of the American department. It was the object of the prefent motion to difarm the Americans of the rage and horror which this doctrine had excited in their minds; and to inculcate the idea that there were L 4 terms terms and conditions implying mutual concessions, on which a fatisfactory and permanent accommodation might be founded, and their constitutional rights fecured. The fecond circumstance to which the Noble Mover alluded, was the certain intelligence which his Grace had himself received, that two French Gentlemen, charged, as there was good reason to believe, with a commission of high and momentous import, had lately been introduced by General Washington to the Congress, with whom conferences had been actually commenced. Thus a direct interference on the part of foreign powers in our civil contentions had undoubtedly taken place, and from a most dangerous and hostile quarter. No time was therefore to be loft to counter-act its effects, and upon the decision of the present moment the sate of the empire depended."

In vain were the powers of reason and eloquence exhausted in support of this motion. The spirit of insatuation and delusion seemed to have attained to its nemé. The Lords in Administration openly avowed and vindicated the doctrine of unconditional submission. They afferted, that the power of granting pardons with proper exceptions was competent to every just and requisite purpose; they afferted the impossibility of an effectual resistance on the part of America; they declared their utter disregard and disbelief of any interference ference on the part of France, or any other foreign Power, which, poffeffing colonies of its own, could never be fo devoid of policy, as to encourage the fpirit of revolt in those of another nation;"-not in the least fensible that the whole tenor of their own conduct afforded the most striking proof how infinitely motives of pride, paffion, and revenge predominate in the heart of man and the councils of princes, over those of reason, policy, and discretion. After a debate, continued to a very late hour, the motion was rejected by 91 voices to 31; and from this moment all rational hope of conciliation vanished. What had been hitherto perfectly easy and feasible, now became, by a change of circumstances, desperate and hopeless; and on hearing the decision of this memorable day, it might with fatal prophetic certainty be pronounced, "TIME IS PAST."

This was the last debate of importance in the present session, which was terminated May 23, 1776, by a speech, in which his Majesty was graciously pleased to intimate "his hope, that his rebellious subjects would still be awakened to a sense of their errors; at the same time expressing his considence, that if due, i. e. unconditional submission could not be obtained by a voluntary return to their duty, it would be effectuated by a full exertion of the great force entrusted to him." WAR, in its most hideous form, was now therefore waged, without without any prospect or probability of accommodation. But though the ministerial majorities in both Houses were so great, the nation at large might be confidered as much more equally divided upon this grand question. At the head of those who were zealous for the profecution of the war in all its terrors, may be accounted the KING himself, who being most unfortunately and dreadfully misinformed and misled in the whole of this business, conceived that the DIGNITY of his CROWN was best vindicated by those measures of coercion which could be carried into effect only by the devaftation of his dominions and the slaughter of his subjects. The powerful remains of the once numerous and now favored faction of the Torics, including a large proportion of the landed interest, recently combined by a strange political phænomenon with the veteran and faithful band of placemen, penfioners, and King's friends; and, in a word, all whose fortunes or expectancies depended on the fmiles of the Court, were to a man eager and ardent in their hopes and wishes to see America prostrate at his Majesty's feet. A great majority of the Clergy of the Established Church also entered into the views of the Court, to which they were now cordially reconciled with a degree of political fervor heightened, as to many of them, into inexpreffible malevolence against the Colonies, by the indelible taint of religious bigotry. The

The Americans were perpetually branded by this class of men, as fanatics, hypocrites, puritans, or, in one word, as SECTARIES, a term which in the ears of an High-Churchman of the genuine stamp, is far more hateful than that of Infidel or Atheist. The spirit of High-Churchism, which is a compound effence exhaled from the ingredients of pride, ignorance, malice, prejudice and folly, has, during this reign, been in a regular and progreffive state of increase; and as the same causes which have operated still continue to operate, it is probable that until fome violent convulsion is produced by a new Laudian or Sheldonian perfecution, the tide will continue to flow in the same channel and direction. Exclusive of these different classes of men, it must also be acknowledged, that a confiderable number of respectable persons, who valued themselves, however inconsistently, upon their attachment to Whig principles, joined the party of the Court, from a most erroneous idea, that the principles of Whiggism inculcated the doctrine of the OMNIPOTENCE of PARLIAMENT; not confidering, that the effential and immutable difference fubfifting in the relative fituations of Great Britain and America made that doctrine, which, in opposition to the arbitrary power of the Crown, was confidered as the basis of Liberty in England, the effence of Tyranny to the Colonies; and the unrestrained power of taxation in particular.

cular, was on feveral accounts more likely to be abused by a popular Assembly, in its exercise over a distant community, than by an absolute Monarch. On the other hand, the great body of the Whigs, headed by various families of the highest rank, to whom power had been chiefly entrufted fince the æra of the Revolution till the Accession of the present Sovereign, held the war in abhorrence and detestation; and they conceived resistance to be equally justifiable to the tyranny of the many as of the few, or the mere will of a despot. The commercial part of the community, with the City of London conspicuous in the van, were for the most part extremely averse to the war, from which they experienced great inconvenience; and which, unfettered by the entanglements of political theories, they perceived by the clear light of common fense to have no rational end or object. A confiderable proportion of the Clergy, men candid, impartial, intelligent, and truly attached to the principles of civil and religious liberty, joined in lamenting this difastrous and fatal quarrel. The whole body of Diffenters, and Sectaries of all denominations, threw the entire weight of their numbers and influence into the fame scale; many of these employed their pens ably and eloquently in the cause of America, amongst whom by far the most distinguished was the celebrated Dr. Richard Price, a Diffenting Minister of extraordinary learning and talents, who had recently written with profound skill on the subject of the National Finances, and the powers of the Sinking Fund; the restoration of which he urged with great energy. And his ideas on the fubject, though long treated as chimerical, have been at length adopted by the prefent Minister, Mr. Pitt, whose famous Sinking Fund Bill was framed in strict conformity to the ideas fuggefted by this excellent and difinterested patriot, who disdained any other reward than that refulting from the confciousness of the services he had rendered to his country. On the present occafion he published "OBSERVATIONS on the Justice and Policy of the WAR with AMERICA," which had a rapid and prodigious fale, and produced an incredible number of replies; for to reply was cafy, though to confute impossible. "In a FREE STATE," fays this admirable writer, "all the fprings of action have room to operate, and the mind is ftimulated to the noblest exertions. The subjects of free States have in all ages been most distinguished for genius and knowledge. With what luftre do the antient free States of Greece shine in the annals of the world! How different is that country now under the Great Turk! The difference between a country inhabited by MEN and by BRUTES is not greater. These are reflections which should be constantly present to every mind in this country. There is nothing that requires to be watched than power; there is nothing that ought to be opposed with more determined resolution than its encroachments. Sleep in a State, as Montesquieu fays, is always followed by Slavery. In governing diftant provinces, and adjusting the clashing interests of different societies, it is particularly necessary to make a sparing use of power in order to preferve power. Happy would it have been for Great Britain, had this been remembered by those who have lately conducted its affairs. But our policy has been of another kind. By a progression of violent measures, every one of which has increased diffress, we have given the world reafon to conclude, that we know no other mode of governing than by force. But our Rulers should have confidered that freemen will always revolt at the fight of a naked fword, and that the complicated affairs of a great kingdom holding in fubordination to it a multitude of distant communities, all jealous of their rights, and warmed with spirits as high as our own, require not only the most skilful but the most cautious and tender management. The confequence of a different management we are now feeling. We see ourselves driven among rocks, and in danger of being loft: pride and the love of dominion are principles hateful enough, but blind refentment and the defire of revenge are infernal principles. One cannot help indeed being aftonished at the virulence with which some speak, on the prefent 3 present occasion, of the Colonies—for what have they done? Have they croffed the ocean and invaded us? Have they attempted to take from us the fruits of our labor, and to overturn that form of government which we hold fo facred? On the contrary, this is what we have done to them. We have transported ourselves to their peaceful retreats. and employed our fleets and armies to stop up their ports, to destroy their commerce, and to burn their towns; -- and yet it is we who imagine ourfelves ill used. Had we never deserted our old ground; had we nourished and favored America with a view to commerce, instead of considering it as a country to be governed; had we, like a liberal and wife people, rejoiced to fee a multitude of free States branching forth from ourselves, all enjoying independent Legislatures fimilar to our own; had we aimed at binding them to us only by the ties of affection and interest, and contented ourfelves with a moderate power rendered durable by being lenient and friendly, an umpire in their differences, an aid to them in improving their own free governments, and their common bulwark against the affaults of foreign enemies; had this been our policy and temper, there is nothing fo great or happy that we might not have expected. Instead of this, how have we acted?—It is in truth too evident, that our whole conduct has been nothing, to fay the best of it, but a series of the blindest rigor rigor followed by retractation—of violence followed by concession-of mistake, weakness; and inconfiftency. Did ever Heaven punish the vices of a people more feverely by darkening their Counfels? In the Netherlands, a few States fimilarly circumstanced with those of America, withstood for 30 years the whole force of the Spanish monarchy when at its zenith, and at last humbled its pride, and emancipated itself from its týranny. The citizens of Syracufe, also thus circumstanced, withftood the whole power of the Athenians. The fame happened in the contest between the House of Auftria and the Cantons of Switzerland. There is an infinite différence between fighting to deftroy and fighting to preferve liberty. Were we therefore capable of employing a force against America equal to its own, there would be little probability of fuccess; but to think of conquering that whole Continent with thirty or forty thoufand men, to be transported across the Atlantic, and fed from hence, and incapable of being recruited after any defeat; this is indeed a folly fo great, that language does not afford a name for it. Perhaps I am not in the present instance free from the weakness of superstition, but I fancy I see in these measures something that cannot be accounted for merely by human ignorance. am inclined to think that the hand of Providence is in them, working to bring about fome great ends.

ends. But suppose the attempt to subjugate America fuccessful, would it not be a fatal preparative for fubduing yourselves? Would not the disposal of American places, and the distribution of an American revenue, render that influence of the Crown irrefiftible which has already flabbed your liberties? Turn your eyes to India: there, more has been done than is now attempted in America: there, Englishmen, actuated by the love of plunder and the spirit of conquest, have depopulated whole kingdoms, and ruined millions of innocent people by the most infamous oppression and rapacity. The justice of the Nation has slept over these enormities. Will the JUSTICE of HEAVEN fleep? ARE WE NOT NOW EXECRATED ON BOTH SIDES OF THE GLOBE?"-For this publication the writer was defervedly honoured with the thanks of the City of London, and the freedom of that metropolis was prefented to him in a gold box.

During the pause of anxious suspense preceding the commencement of the memorable campaign of 1776 in America, it will not be improper to take a general review of the state of Europe for some years past, and of its actual situation; his Majesty having in his late Speech afferted, that the disposition of the several Powers of the Continent promised a continuance of the general tranquillity.

FRANCE, in an historic sketch of this kind, must necessarily occupy the fore-ground of the picture.

Vol. II. M The

The death of Louis XV. who, for the long term of nine-and-fifty years, reigned with absolute and arbitrary sway over that vast monarchy, had taken place nearly at the commencement of the prefent troubles (May 10th, 1774). He was fucceeded by his grandfon Louis the Dauphin, who had fcarcely as yet attained the twentieth year of his age. This young Prince had in the year 1770 married the Arch-Duchess Marie Antoinette, daughter of the Empress-Queen-a princess endowed with all the fascinating graces of her fex; by which apparently auspicious alliance, according to the short-fighted views of human policy, the peace of Europe, fo often diffurbed by the contentions of the rival houses of Bourbon and Austria, feemed to be firmly cemented and fecured. A great acquifition of revenue and territory had recently accrued to France by the death of Stanislaus, King of Poland (February 1766), in a far advanced age; in consequence of which event, the duchies of Lorraine and Bar, possessed by that Monarch in full property during his life, reverted to France, agreeably to the treaty concluded A. D. 1736, with the Court of Vienna, under the fortunate aufpices of Cardinal Fleury.

The latter years of the life of the late King of France were passed in a series of political conflicts with the several Parliaments of that kingdom, particularly the Parliament of Paris; which high and august august Tribunal still retained, by means of its conflitutional privilege of enregistering the royal edicts, without which they had no legal validity, fome degree of control over the actions of the Monarch And this relique of their antient independency, by which alone the facred fire of Liberty could be difcerned to exist in France, the Parliament appeared with reason to guard with the most vigilant jealoufy. An edict having been iffued in the royal name, by which new and extraordinary powers were transferred to the Great Council, incompatible with the established rights of the Parliaments of the kingdom, remonstrances were presented to the King from most of those bodies; and in that offered by the Parliament of Paris (May 19, 1768) is the following remarkable passage :- "Your Parliament, Sire, is not afraid on this head to remind your Majesty of the ever memorable words which the First President Harley addressed to Henry III. in 1586. "Sire," faid the magistrate, "we have two forts of laws: - one fort are the ordonnances of our Kings, and these may be altered according to the differences of times and circumstances; the other fort are the ordonnances of the kingdom. which are inviolable, and by which you afcend to the Throne and to the Crown, which your predeceffors preferved. Among these public laws, that is of the most facred kind, and has been most religiously kept by your predecessors, which orders M 2 that that no law or ordonnance shall be published but what is verified in this Assembly—They thought a violation of this law was a violation of that by which they were made Kings."

It was afterwards proposed, at an extraordinary session, to state to the King that the existence of the Grand Council itself was a grievance. This, however, was negatived, the Duc de Choiseul and the Princes of the Blood attending in person to oppose the motion, by a majority of two voices; and the Parliament contented itself with presenting another memorial to the King, shewing the necessity of ascertaining the limits of its jurisdiction, and securing the Parliament against its encroachments by a clear and positive law. But the Parliament of Toulouse, less moderate, issued an arrêt, by which all persons were forbidden, under severe penalties, to conform to, or execute any judgment of the Grand Council within the province of Languedoc.

Scarcely had the ferments excited by this obnoxious procedure of the Court in any degree fubfided, when a new and far more ferious contest arose in consequence of the memorable prosecution commenced in the Parliament of Paris against the Duc d'Aiguillon, Governor of the Province of Bretagne, for high crimes and missements in the administration of his government. While the Nation was waiting in anxious suspense the result of this trial, which had already disclosed a scene of cruelty

King thought proper to hold a Bed of Justice, in which he commanded an edict to be enregistered suppressing the charges brought against this nobleman, and prohibiting any farther proceedings against him. The Parliament of Paris, on re-assembling, iffued an arrêt, by which the Duke was forbidden to take his seat in Parliament, or to exercise any of the sunctions of the peerage, till a legal acquittal had taken place. This arrêt was annulled by a decree of the King in Council, declaring it to be an infringement of the royal authority.

The Parliament notwithstanding, by a solemn Act, confirmed their former resolution; and strong representations were made to the King by the different Chambers, particularly by that of the Peers and Princes of the Blood, against his proceedings, as subversive of all law, justice, and equity. The Provincial Parliaments also passed arrêts in approbation and confirmation of that of Paris, and the duchy of Aiguillon was sequestered till the trial of the Duke should be legally terminated. At length the King in person, attended by his guards, entered without any previous notice the Parliament House, and, after reproaching the Members in the feverest terms, ordered all the judicial Acts against the Duc d'Aiguillon to be erased from their registers; and, in menacing language, prohibited all revival of the proceedings against him. The Parliament never-M 3 theless.

theless, unintimidated, issued at their next meeting another arrêt, in which they declare, that the many acts of arbitrary power exercised both against the fpirit and letter of the Constitution of the French Monarchy, and the folemn oath of the King, leave no room to doubt of a premeditated defign to change the form of Government. The dispute continued with increasing violence to the following year. The King having caused by force an edict to be enregistered, by which the indispensable obligation of the Sovereign Courts of Justice to enregifter the royal edicts, even in opposition to their own fentiments and remonstrances, was explicitly declared, the Parliament entered a folemn proteft against the same, as contrary to the laws they had fworn to defend, and refolved upon a total fufpenfion of the functions of the Courts.

The mandate of the King to revoke this decree being peremptorily rejected, the Members of the Parliament were, in the night of the 19th of January 1771, feverally arrefted by virtue of lettres de cachet, and a new Tribunal was erected in the room of the exiled Parliament, composed of men entirely devoted to the Court. Scarcely had they entered into office when they were formally pronounced, by an arrêt of the Parliament of Rouen, to be intruders, usurpers, and enemies to the State. The Court, irritated and enraged, had determined on the most violent measures; but the Duc de Harcourt, court, Governor of Normandy, refused to take the command of the troops appointed for this service. The other Provincial Parliaments adopting a similar line of conduct, were in the course of the year suppressed and banished; and new Parliaments, wholly dependent on the Court, substituted in their room, at Besançon, Bourdeaux, Aix, Toulouse, and Rennes. To shew the utter contempt of the Court for the public opinion, the Duc de Choiseul, who had indicated a disposition in some degree savorable to the rising spirit of Liberty, was dismissed with unusual marks of resentment and disgrace, and the Duc d'Aiguillon succeeded him in the office of First Minister.

The agitation of the Nation at these proceedings cannot be expressed. The Monarch became the object of universal reproach and execration, and not the Monarch merely, but the Monarchy itself. That form of government to which the French nation had been for ages so zealously attached, sunk most sensibly in the public estimation. The tide of opinion began to slow in an opposite direction, and a republican party was visibly forming, which, however small in its beginnings, might well be regarded, under that corrupt and depraved Government, as truly dangerous and formidable. Scarcely were the appearances of decorum preserved on the death of the King; and the appellation of Louis le defiré, unanimously given to his successor, was the bitterest satire on his memory.

The young Monarch, defirous of recommending himself to the favor of his subjects, began his reign with the difiniffion of the Duc d'Aiguillon, and his detestable co-adjutors, the Chancellor Maupeou, and the Comptroller General L'Abbé Terrai, which was regarded as the certain prelude of the reftoration of the antient Parliaments; and on the 12th November 1774, the recall of the Parliament of Paris took place amid the unbounded acclamations of the people. The language of the Monarch on this memorable occasion was nevertheless very high and haughty. In his speech on holding the Bed of Justice, he declared to the Parliament, "that he was determined to preserve his authority in all its plenitude, and that he expected they would give to his fubjects an example of fubmission." He told them, "that the King his grandfather was compelled, by their refistance to his repeated commands, to adopt such measures as his wisdom suggested; and that as he had thought proper to recall them to the exercise of those functions, which they ought never to have quitted, he defired them to learn to prize his favors, and never to lose the remembrance of their extent." A royal ordonnance was then read, containing the various limitations by which the Monarch thought proper to restrain the authority of this Assembly—one very important article of which peremptorily required the Parliament to enregister the royal edicts in one month at farthest after the day of their publication, unless the King should graciously permit the repetition of their remonstrances; and his Majesty concluded with a promise of "his royal protection and countenance so long as they exactly conformed to what he had prescribed, and they did not attempt to enlarge the bounds of the power which was granted to them."

It very foon appeared, after the accession of the new Monarch, though himself of a disposition pacific and unambitious, and extremely limited in his capacity, how little dependence was to be placed on the amity and good faith of France. A powerful party immediately arose at the Court, of which the QUEEN, a woman of high spirit, busy, bold, and blind to confequences, was confidered as the head. Diffolute in her manners, unprincipled in her morals, faithless in her promises, this Princess wanted only the talents of her predecessor Catherine of Medicis, to be as illustriously distinguished for guilt-BUT HER MISFORTUNES HAVE ATONED. This faction burned with a defire to avenge the difgraces of the last war; and America received every encouragement to perfift in her refistance to the oppression of England, that was consistent with even the appearance of a decent regard to the occational cafional remonstrances and memorials of the Court of London. The Queen also was believed to be actuated by an ardent desire of advancing the interests of the House of Austria, by involving France in contentions which would effectually prevent any interposition of that power in opposition to the schemes of aggrandizement projected by her brother the Emperor. In the mean time the views of M. de Maurepas, the new Minister, were affiduously directed to the extension of commerce, and the re-establishment of the French marine.

"The fituation of France," fays the King of Pruffia in reference to the prefent period, "though far from brilliant, did not the less merit the attention of other Powers. Her debts made it impracticable for her to fustain a long war; but, strong in her alliance with Spain, and in the affiftance thence to be derived, the was watching the moment to fall like a falcon upon her prey, and avenge herfelf upon Great Britain for the disasters she had suffered during the preceding war. England was at this time, under the YOKE of the TORIES, engaged in a ruinous contest, which augmented the national debts thirty-fix millions of crowns per annum. For the purpose of striking a blow upon her right arm with her left, she exhausted all her resources, and advanced with hafty steps to her decline and fall. Her Ministers ACCUMULATED faults; but of all thefe the greatest was the WAR with AMERICA, from which no poffible advantage could refult. She had needlefsly, and without reason, embroiled herfelf with all the surrounding powers, and to her own misconduct only could England ascribe that state of describin and general abandonment in which she now found herself*."

That union of counfels which fince the æra of the Family Compact had marked the politics of the Bourbon Courts, still subsisted in its full vigor. In order to confolidate the friendship of the two Crowns, the late King of France had made an entire cession of the province of Louisiana to Spain, without any other apparent motive or equivalent. In his Most Christian Majesty's letter, dated April 21, 1764, to M. d'Abadie, Director General and Commandant of the Colony of Louifiana, notifying this extraordinary ceffion, he fays, " By a special Act done at Fontainebleau (Nov. 3d, -1762), of my own will and mere motion having ceded to my very dear and best beloved cousin the King of Spain, and his fucceffors, in full property, purely and fimply, and without any exceptions, the whole country known by the name of Louisiana, together with New Orleans, and the island in which the faid city is fituated: You are, on the receipt of these presents, to deliver up, to the Governor or Officer appointed by the King of Spain, the faid country and colony of Louisiana."

The discontents prevailing in Spain since the accession of the present King, and which at length broke out into open infurrection, were appealed by the dismission of the Marquis de Squillacio, and the other Neapolitans who had accompanied the Sovereign from Italy; and the attention of the Court of Madrid had been for fome years chiefly occupied with the means of effecting the expulsion of the Jesuits from the kingdom; which was at length carried into execution with circumstances of relentless cruelty, not inferior to those which distinguished the expulsion of the Moriscoes in the last century. The other branches of the House of Bourbon, France, Naples and Parma, followed the example fet by Spain; and this once famous and flourishing order of religionists now found themfelves in almost every country the objects of reproach, hatred, and perfecution. Urgent folicitations were made by the Catholic Powers to the Pope Clement XIII. for the utter abolition of this order; but the Holy Father, notwithstanding the feizure of Avignon by France, and Benevento by Naples, in order to enforce a compliance, perfifted in a peremptory and positive refusal.

A very remarkable edict having been published by the Infant Duke of Parma, virtually annihilating the authority of the Papal See in his dominions, the Roman Pontiff iffued, January 1767, a BULL against the Duke, in terms which the haughtiest of his predeceffors could fearcely have exceeded. By this inftrument the Pope claimed to himself the fovereignty of the Duchy of Parma, and declared the Duke to be only his feudatory. He pronounced, on the authority of the Church, and of former decisions of his predecessors, that ecclesiastics are not subject to any temporal power or laic jurisdiction; and that, seeing the Duke had been guilty of an infringement of the immunities of the Church, he had justly incurred its heaviest censures; and unless he desisted from his rash enterprise, he now gave him warning, "that the fentence of excommunication would be denounced against him, and his dominions laid under an interdict." Nor on the joint application of the Courts of France, Spain, and Vienna, would his Holiness deign to revoke this decree, or even admit the Ambassadors of these Powers to an audience. As the common father of the faithful, the Pope disclaimed indeed every idea of executing any decree of the Holy See by the aid of temporal force, were it in his power: On the contrary, he declared himfelf ready, after the example of his predecessors, to suffer whatever personal injury might befall him, and to go into exile wherever it might be thought proper to fend him, rather than betray the interests of religion, and of the Church. The Holy See, he added, was not accustomed to revoke its judgments, which were never passed till after the most mature deliberation, and always with the affiftance of the Holy Ghost. At length, loaded with years, with grief, and infirmities, this arrogant and inflexible Pontiff funk into his grave; and the famous Ganganelli, who affuned the name of Clement XIV. was, after the Conclave had fat three months, elected, May 1769, to the vacant chair of St. Peter. The pontificate of Ganganelli was rendered for ever memorable by the abolition of the order of the Jesuits, in virtue of a Bull, iffued A. D. 1773, charging them with having adopted opinions fcandalous, contrary to good morals, and of dangerous import to the Church and all Christian States.

This Pontiff died in the course of the next year (1774) universally beloved and regretted, not without suspicion of poison, of which he is said to have been himself previously apprehensive; but of this no sufficient evidence has been produced. He was succeeded by Cardinal Braschi, who took the appellation of Pius VI. Nearly at the same time died Charles Emanuel, King of Sardinia, after a reign of forty-three years. He succeeded to the Throne on the resignation of his father in 1730, and governed his dominions with great prudence and selicity. His son, Victor Amadeus, after the acquisition of Corsica by France, perceiving the ascendancy dancy acquired by the House of Bourbon, entered into a strict alliance with the Court of Versailles—the Princess Clotilda, sister to the King of France, marrying the Prince of Piedmont; and the two Princesses, daughters of his Sardinian Majesty, espousing the Counts de Provence and d'Artois, brothers of his Most Christian Majesty.

In the north of Europe Ruffia fill maintained her full afcendancy, and the predominance which the had acquired in the affairs of Poland was opposed not by the glorious ardor of civil liberty, but by a wretched and miserable spirit of religious bigotry; and the majority of the Diet, instigated by the BISHOPS, still persisted in refusing to the Diffidents, who were chiefly of the Greek church, that liberty of conscience to which they were entitled, not merely by the rights of nature, but by the most express and solemn conventions.

In the year 1563, a law worthy to be inscribed in letters of gold on a table of adamant, was enacted at the Diet of Wilna, under the fanction of Sigismund Augustus, the greatest of the Polish Monarchs, declaring, "that all those of the equestrian and noble orders, whether of Lithuanian, Polish, or Russian extraction, in every part of his dominions, shall be eligible to all honors, dignities, and trusts, without distinction or exception, according to his merit, provided he profess the Christian Christian religion." This law, while it continued in force, was productive of the most falutary effects; but the Crown of Poland too foon descending to weak and bigoted princes, the oppressions of the Diffidents recommenced in various forms. After many viciffitudes of fortune, by the Pacification of Oliva, A. D. 1660, their rights and privileges were at length completely restored, and guaranteed by England, Sweden, and the other high contracting parties to that famous treaty. Nevertheless, under the two last Monarchs of the Protestant House of Saxony, who, in the genuine spirit of apostacy, were eager to fignalize their zeal for the faith they had fo recently embraced, Persecution, which had long mourned over her broken wheel, again reared her gorgon creft; and notwithstanding the wisdom and moderation of the present Sovereign, and the powerful intercession of the Courts of Berlin, London, and Petersburg, the most severe and unjust edicts Conceiving themselves depaffed against them. voted to destruction, they at length flew to arms, and being supported by the power of Russia, the whole kingdom, divided into opposite CONFEDE-RACIES, became for a succession of years a scene of the most dreadful misery and consusion:-nor would the blind rage characteristic of civil and religious discord, permit the infatuated Poles to perceive that, by these senseless and horrid contentions. 5 tentions they were exhausting the vital strength of their country, and offering themselves up an easy prey to the rapacity of foreign invaders.

In an excellent memorial presented by Mr. Wroughton, the English Resident at Warsaw, November 1766, the memorialist fays, "Although the rights and privileges of the Diffidents are founded on a doctrine whose principles of charity and benevolence make it characteristic of Christianity, yet it is this religion of which the exercise is diffurbed, and of which the profesfors are excluded from all honorable employ, and deprived of all means of ferving their country; and the Ambaffador urges, in the name of the King his mafter, that with regard to their ecclefiaftical and civil rights, the Diffidents may be re-established on the facred foundations of the treaty of Oliva."—Happy would it have been had England herself adhered to that wife policy which she so carnestly recommended to Poland. But while she was thus laudably folicitous to extend the shield of her protection to the Polish Dislidents, she forgot that her wn code of laws inflicted the most cruel and oppressive penalties upon the same class of citizens within her own dominion; and that the Diffidents of England also were the objects of a legal profcription. That the same direful consequences did not refult from these laws, was to be imputed folely to that prevailing spirit of lenity, characteristic which forbad or impeded their execution. If any certain conclusion can be deduced from reason, experience, and the uniform tenor of history, it is, that toleration in its fullest extent is a principle in the highest degree falutary and beneficial; and that intolerance in any shape or mode never yet appeared without producing a correspondent measure of animosity, discord, and misery *.

It is not to be imagined that Turkey, who regarded the growing greatness of Ruffia with anxious on the theory and practice of Government, unbiassed by views of personal aggrandizement, there can be no greater authority adduced than that of the King of Prussia. On the subject of Toleration, he fays, "De fombres politiques vous diront, tout le monde doit être de la même opinion, pour que rien ne divise les Citoyens. Le théologien ajoute, Quiconque ne pense pas comme moi est damué; il faut donc les détruire dans ce monde pour qu'ils prospèrent d'autant mieux dans l'autre. Mais si l'on remonte à l'origine de la société, il est tout-à-sait évident que le Souverain n'a aucun droit sur la façon de penser des citoyens. Ne faudroit-il pas être en DEMENCE pour se sigurer que des hommes ont dit à un homme leur femblable-Nous vous élevons au desfus de nous parceque nous aimons l'esclavage, & nous vous donnons la puissance de diriger nos pensées à votre volonté? Ils ont dit au contraire: Nous avons besoin de vous pour maintenir les lois auxquelles nous voulons obéir, pour nous gouverner fagement, pour nous défendre. Du reste, nous exigeons de vous que vous respectiez notre liberté. Voilà la sentence prononcée; ELLE est sans appel; et même cette tolérance est si avantageuse aux sociétés où elle est établie qu'elle fait le bonheur de PEtat.

xious and envious apprehension, could be satisfied to remain a mere spectator of the troubles in Poland. Repeated demands were made by the Porte to the Court of Petersburg, to withdraw her armies from the territories of the republic, and to maintain that neutrality which the Porte itself had religiously observed. These remonstrances were either wholly neglected, or produced only vague and evafive declarations; and in the frequent conflicts which took place between the Ruffian troops and the Catholic confederates near the borders of the Turkish empire, the rights of fovereignty were occasionally violated, and many causes of complaint occurred. At length matters were brought to a crifis by the fack of the town of Balta in Leffer Tartary, to which a party of the confederates had fled for refuge, and which was immediately attacked and carried fword in hand by the Ruffians, who maffacred great numbers of the inhabitants. On receiving intelligence of this event at Conftantinople, M. Obrescow, Resident of the Court of St. Petersburg, was at an extraordinary meeting of the Divan required to fign articles, importing fatisfaction for the injuries fuftained, and the immediate withdrawing of the Ruffian troops from Poland; and on his refusal, the Ambaffador was committed (October 1768) prisoner to the castle of the Seven Towers.

The war which enfued between the two cinpires exhibits an almost continued series of triumphs on the part of the Ruffians. After the reduction of the provinces north of the Danube, the Russian commander Marshal Romanzoff passed that great river, and carried his victorious arms into the kingdom of Bulgaria, where the Turkish crescent, elevated on the ruins of the Christian cross, had reigned for centuries unmolested. By sea the efforts of the Court of St. Petersburg were no less A fleet under Count Orloff, with extraordinary. many able English officers on board, failing from the Gulph of Finland in the fummer of 1770, entered the Mediterranean, and totally defeated the Turkish fleet in the channel of Scio; the shattered remains of which retiring for fafety to the harbor of Chesme, on the coast of Natolia, were by means of fire-ships in the night after the battle entirely destroyed. The Turkish Government was at the fame time alarmed by a general revolt of the Greeks in the Morea; by a rebellion in Egypt, headed by the famous Ali Bey; by another in Syria, conducted by Cheik Daher; and a fourth in Georgia, under Prince Heraclius; fo that the enormous fabric of that unwieldy and ill-compacted empire seemed to totter to its fall. These various infurrections were however finally suppreffed. 200 preffed, and a peace concluded with Ruffia at Kainardgi, July 1774, on the humiliating terms of ceding to Ruffia the whole country between the Bog and the Nieper; of confenting to the absolute independency of the Crimea; and of allowing to the shipping of Russia a free navigation in all the Turkish seas, including the passage through the Dardanelles. The Grand Seignor Mustapha III. did not live to the conclusion of this difastrous war. 10 He ascended the throne of the Ottomans, A. D. 1757, on the death of his uncle Ofman III. who had three years before succeeded his brother Mahomet V. The late Sultan Muftapha, agreeably to the laws antiently established in Turkey, was fucceeded, after an eventful reign of fixteen years, by his brother Abdul-Hamet, or Achinet IV; Sultan Selim, eldeft fon of the late Emperor, not having yet attained the age of ma-Jefrally arrolled a jority.

During the continuance of this war, a grand project was formed by the Courts of Vienna, Petersburg, and Berlin, originally suggested by the inventive genius of the King of Prussia, for the partition of Poland. Different interviews had taken place between the King and the Emperor at Neisse in Silesia, August 1769, and at Neustadt in Moravia the following year, in which mutual protestations of regard and inviolable friendship were exchanged with the usual sincerity of princes. The judgment passed by the N 3 unerring penetration of the Pruffian Monarch refpecting the Emperor, was, "that with a disposition to learn, he had not patience enough to be instructed." On the accession of the Empress of Russia to this conspiracy of Sovereigns, manifestoes were published A. D. 1772, by all these powers, flating their claims and pretenfions to fuch provinces as happened to be most commodious for their purpose, and lying contiguous to their own territories. To Russia was allotted the whole country westward of the rivers Dwina and Nieper. The Emperor seized upon a vast tract of land, extending from the frontiers of Moravia to the province of Volhynia, and fituated in a direct course to the northward of Hungary and Transylvania, on which the pompous appellations were bestowed of the kingdoms of Gallicia and Ludomiria. whole of Royal Pruffia, with fome adjoining diftricts of Great Poland, fell to the share of the King of Pruffia, all which he claimed as his clear and indifputable right; it being, as this Monarch was pleafed to affirm in his manifesto, NOTORIOUS, "that the Kings of Poland did many ages ago violently diffeife the Dukes of Pomerania, the Dukes of Stettin. and the Dukes of Dantzick, his Majesty's ancestors, of those dominions, which his Majesty, as sole heir and universal successor of all these Dukes, now so justly and equitably reclaimed." In vain did the King and Diet of Poland protest against these unheardheard-of claims, and extravagant pretentions. vain did they appeal to all Europe, that the dominions of the Republic were not only fecured to them by the prescription of centuries, but were guaranteed by the most folemn treaties; and that should an act of such enormous perfidy and injustice be permitted or connived at, every principle of public faith would be subverted, and nations must hereafter acknowledge no other law than that of force. The Diet was in the end compelled to ratify these claims; and at the same time important alterations were made in the Constitution of the Republic, by which the power of the Crown was still farther reduced, particularly in the establishment of a Permanent Executive Council, in which the Monarch prefided with only a fingle voice. All these atrocious proceedings, so nearly and deeply. affecting the balance of power on the Continent, were viewed with apparent indifference by the great Potentates of Europe; particularly by England, then intent on her desperate projects of American fubjugation; although in later times the poslession of a fingle town * has been thought fo materially to affect that balance, as to justify a war for the fole purpose of effecting its restoration. A. grand alliance, projected by the Cabinet of Verfailles, between the Courts of Verfailles, London, Madrid, and Turin, in order to counterbalance that fubfifting between the Courts of Petersburg, Vienna, and Berlin, not meeting with encouragement from England, perished in embryo.

The fituation of the Scandinavian Courts yet remains to be described. Frederic V. King of Denmark, had departed this life January 1766. He was a just, wife, and beneficent prince; the friend and father of his fubjects, by whom he was beloved with unfeigned ardor, and who bedewed his monument with the tears of gratitude and affec-He was fucceeded by his fon Christian VII. who in a few months after his accession espoused the Princess Carolina Matilda, youngest fister of the King of England. Soon after this marriage the young Monarch left his kingdom, actuated by a reftlefs and roving defire of vifiting foreign countries. In the year 1768 he arrived in England, where he was entertained with great magnificence; whence he paffed into France and Germany, and did not return to his dominions till the following year. The apparent weakness and incapacity of the King, on his affuming the reins of government, fufficiently demonstrated that he had gained no valuable accession of knowledge by his late travels. A certain German physician, of the name of Struensee, who had attended the King abroad, had acquired the entire afcendancy over him, and being created a Count was placed at the head of affairs;

the Ministers of the late King, Counts Bernstorf, Holke, &c. being previously disgraced. With the rash presumption incident to sudden and unmerited prosperity, this man attempted to introduce many innovations into the government and police of the kingdom, by which he made himself universally odious. The very high favor in which he evidently ftood with the Queen, also gave rise to imputations little to the advantage of her Majesty's character. At length, by an unexpected and extraordinary Courtrevolution, conducted by the Queen Dowager and her fon Prince Frederic, Struensee and his principal partifans were arrested under the fanction of a warrant compulforily figned by the King. The Queen herself was committed close prisoner to the Castle of Cronenburg, January 1772. the fequel, Struensee suffered on a public scaffold; and the Queen, against whom it was for fome time a fubject of doubt whether a capital process should not be instituted, was allowed, through the powerful interposition of England, to retire from the Danish dominions, and found an afylum in the city of Zell, where, after refiding fome years, fhe died in neglect and obscurity.

The events which passed nearly at the same time in Sweden, were of a nature in a political view far more important and interesting. High disputes had for many years subsisted between the King and the Senate. At length, in consequence of a refusal of the Senate to convoke an extraordinary Diet, which the King declared to be absolutely necessary to remedy the evils which distracted the State, an instrument was figned by the King, and delivered by the Prince Royal to the different Colleges of Justice, of Finance, and of War, by which the King notified to them in form, that until the States were convoked, he found himself under the necessity of abdicating the government. This was a measure of deep policy, and at the same time of great popularity, the Senate having rendered themselves universally odious by the abuse of the powers entrusted to them by the Constitution. The different Executive Departments of the State refusing to act after this notification, the Senate most reluctantly convened the Diet, which met at Norkioping in the month of April 1769. The Secret Committee in a short time brought twentyfour articles of accufation against the Scnators, and allowed them forty-eight hours only to prepare for their defence; and they were in the refult degraded from their offices. The Court nevertheless failed in the grand point of effecting an extension of its powers. On the question being put, "Whether it be proper to make any innovations in the fundamental constitution of the kingdom," it was carried in the negative, in the Order of Nobles, by 457 to 431 voices. The Orders of Burghers and Peafants also severally decided against any alterations of the existing political system. Things continued therefore nearly in the fame state till the death of the King, which took place early in the year 1771. He was succeeded by his son, Gustayus the Third, who was at that period absent at the Court of Verfailles. On his return to Sweden, he passed some days at Berlin; and at these two Courts the project of a Revolution in the Government of Sweden was undoubtedly concerted, although the King, in his letter to the States, gave them the most solemn affurances, that he would inviolably adhere to the Constitution or Formula of Government settled in the year 1720. In his speech at the opening of the Diet in June, he declared, that he confidered it as his greatest glory to be the first citizen of a free country; and at his coronation, which took place in the month of February 1772, he not only took the customary oath, but, by a voluntary declaration, he formally abfolved the States from their allegiance, should he ever attempt any infringement of the capitulations to which he had then fworn. All this however was the refult of a ftudied and confummate hypocrify. After a long train of the most artful preparations, he at length determined, on the morning of the 19th of August 1772, to throw off the mask. Summoning the Officers of the Royal Guard, he infinuated to them that his life was in danger from the machinations of the Senators—painted in strong colors colors the wretched state of the kingdom, and declared, that his only defign was to banish corruption, establish true liberty, and revive the ancient lustre of the Swedish name. "Will you," said he, " be faithful to me, as your forefathers were to Gustavus Vasa and Gustavus Adolphus? I will then risk my life for your welfare and that of my country." The Officers expressing in warm terms their attachment to the King, and their readiness to concur in his defigns, a detachment of grenadiers was posted with bayonets fixed at the door of the Council Chamber, where the Senators were actually engaged in deliberation, to prevent all ingress or egress. Other principal Leaders of the Aristocratic party were also at the same time put under an arrest; and the King, mounting his horse, followed by his officers and foldiers, rode through the fireets of Stockholm, addreffing himfelf to the innumerable crowds which were gathered together, and protesting, "that he only meant to defend them, and fave the country from ruin, and that if they could not confide in him, he would refign his fceptre and his kingdom." The deluded people, with loud acclamations, applauded his patriotifm, and entreated him not to abandon them. No fymptom of refistance any where appeared; and the Diet being in a few days convened, the King addressed the States in a long harangue, in which, after describing in forcible language the diforders disorders and missortunes in which party divisions had plunged the nation, he ordered the new Formula of Government to be read, which he now proposed for their acceptance. By one article of the new Constitution, the King was vested with the power of affembling and diffolving the States at pleasure. By another, he was to have the fole disposal of the Army, the Navy, the Finances, and all employments Civil and Military. By a third, all exifting taxes were made perpetual; and the King, in case of pressing necessity, might impose new taxes till the States should be affembled. And by a fourth, the States, when affembled, were to deliberate only on those questions which the King thought proper to refer to them. The Instrument of Government being read, the King demanded whether they approved of it? Cannon being planted in the court facing the Hall where the States were affembled, and matroffes standing over them with lighted matches, the Affembly declared with one voice their entire affent to these articles; and the oath of fidelity was immediately administered to them. After which, Te Deum was fung by his Majesty and the Assembly, in devout commemoration of this most happy event. And thus was a Revolution accomplished, which converted one of the most limited Monarchies in Europe into one of the most absolute, without shedding a fingle drop of blood; and the Nation at large, large, which had been grievously oppressed under the former Aristocratic Constitution, and which had never attained to true and rational ideas of liberty, were delighted with the present change of government, from which they hoped to enjoy tranquillity and security at least, if not the selicity and advantages of political freedom.

It is now high time to revert to the more proper subject of the present history, and to resume the narration of military operations in America. It has been before remarked, that the fiege or blockade of Quebec, notwithstanding the disaftrous iffue of General Montgomery's attempt, was continued through the winter with aftonishing refolution by Colonel Arnold, who was afterwards fuperfeded by General Sullivan. Early in the fpring, before the Americans could be joined by their expected reinforcements, a naval armament from Great Britain, confifting of the Isis of 54 guns, accompanied by the Surprise frigate and the Martin floop, forced their passage through the ice before the navigation of the St. Laurence was deemed practicable. General Carleton, animated no less than firengthened by the welcome and feafonable fuccors they brought, immediately marched out in force in order to attack the American camp; but the befiegers, weakened by hardship and disease, and now altogether despairing of fuccess, had already begun their retreat, abandoning doning their baggage, artillery and stores, and directing their march towards Sorel, which they reached in a few days in a very ill condition. Towards the end of May, all the reinforcements being now arrived from England, a very great force was collected in Canada; the general rendezvous of which was appointed at Trois Rivieres, half way between Montreal and Quebec, about ninety miles from each. General Burgoyne, who was fecond in command, had orders to purfue the Continental Army up the Sorel to St. John's. This post was now abandoned by the Americans, who retreated in confusion to Isle aux Noix, and from thence to Crown Point. Montreal and Chamblée had been also previously evacuated, and the garrisons with difficulty avoided being entirely cut off. Still the Americans were masters of Lake Champlain, and the greatest exertions were made by the Generals Carleton and Burgoyne, to construct a number of vessels of sufficient force to give them that superiority which was effential to the fuccess of the expedition now meditated to the fouthward; and, till this purpose was effected, military operations were entirely suspended in the province of Ca-A firong fquadron, commanded by Sir Peter Parker, with about 3000 land forces on board, failed from Cork in the month of February, on an expedition to the Middle or Southern Colo-The departure of this fleet was delayed by a fina fingular circumstance. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Harcourt, doubting his power to permit the troops to leave the kingdom, a claufe expressly authorifing him to do was inferted in a Bill then pending in the Parliament of Irc-When the Bill came to England, the clause was struck out with indignation, as implying an undue limitation of the prerogative. the Lord Lieutenant, conceiving himself pledged by the King's word folemnly given to the Irish Parliament, refused to permit the troops to embark without leave of the Legislature; and a new clause was hastily inserted in another Bill, which was transmitted and passed, though not without great resentment against the Lord Lieutenant, who, on his arrival in England fome time afterwards, met at Court with a very indifferent reception.

On the 3d of May 1776, Admiral Sir Peter Parker anchored off Cape Fear, where he was joined by General Clinton; and finding that nothing could be attempted with probability of fueces in Virginia, it was determined to try the event of an attack on the city of Charlestown, the capital of South-Carolina; and in the beginning of June, the whole fleet anchored off Charlestown Bar. Prior to their arrival, the city had been put into a proper posture of desence; and works were erected on Sullivan's Island, mounted with thirty thirty pieces of cannon, in a very advantageous fituation for annoying ships in their approach to the town. The militia of the province were now collected in great numbers for the defence of the metropolis, aided by several continental regiments, and the whole were commanded by General Lee, who had traversed the whole extent of the Continent with wonderful expedition, in order to put himself at their head.

On the 28th of June, the Briftol and Experiment, each of 50 guns, supported by several fmaller thips, had with fome difficulty croffed the bar, and advanced to the attack of the fort on -Sullivan's Island, constructed entirely of the palmetto, a foft and fpungy wood, in which a ball entering is buried, and makes no extended fracture. A most furious cannonade now began from the shipping, which was returned with equal fury and much more effect from the fort. The ships were almost torn to pieces, and the flaughter was dreadful. During the conflict, the feamen looked frequently and impatiently to fee the land forces advance from Long Island, where they had some time before effected a landing, to Sullivan's Island, from which it is feparated by a creek, in general fordable, but at this time, through a long continuance of eafterly winds, deep and dangerous to attempt. The firing did not cease till evening, when the ships slipped their cables and withdrew VOL. II. from from the scene of action, after an engagement supported on both sides with uncommon spirit and vigor. The Actaon, of 28 guns, having run aground, was abandoned and fet on fire. Capt. Morris, of the Briftol, after displaying heroic valor, received a wound which proved mortal. Captain Scott, of the Experiment, and Lord William Campbell, late Governor of the Colony, who now with great gallantry ferved as a volunteer on board the fleet, were also dangerously wounded, with more than 200 men of the crews of these two fhips only. Col. Moultrie, the Commandant of the fort, merits diftinguished mention, for the skill and cool determined valor with which he conducted his defence. The defign on Charlestown was, after this difafter, abandoned; and Sir Peter Parker immediately fet fail for New York.

It being now thoroughly ascertained, that the utmost lenity which America had to expect from Britain, was pardon upon unconditional submission; the minds of the generality of men throughout the Continent were by this time sully prepared for a formal declaration of Independency. North Carolina and Pennsylvania, which had long opposed this measure, now signified their concurrence. Maryland alone still discovered symptoms of reluctance. General Lee, in a letter written at this time to a person of distinction in that colony, in terms very characteristic of his ardent and fiery disposition, says, "I know not whether, in the whole course of my life, I ever read any thing which so much moved my pity and indignation as the late declaration of the Convention of Maryland, They declare, they shall esteem separation from Great Britain as the last of misfortunes. What! when an attempt has been inade to rob you and your posterity of your birthrights—when your fields have been laid wafte, your towns have been burnt, and your citizens butchered; when your property is feized and confiscated in all parts of the world; when an inexorable Tyrant, an abandoned Parliament, and a corrupt pufillanimous People have formed an hellish league to rob you of every thing men hold most dear; is it possible there should be creatures, who march on two legs, and call themselves human, who can be so deftitute of fentiment, courage, and feeling, as fobbingly to proteft, they shall consider separation from these butchers and robbers as the last of misfortunes?

"Oh, I could brain you with your ladies' fans."

In pursuance, however, at length of instrucions transinitted from all parts of the province, the Maryland Convention passed a vote in savour of Independence; and the Delegates of all the Thirteen Colonies assembled in General Congress being now unanimous, the Declaration of Independence was solemnly promulgated on the 4th of July 1776. This famous Declaration commences with the acknowledgement, "That:respect to the opinions of mankind requires, that, when in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation; and they affert the unalterable right of the People, whenever government becomes deftructive of those ends for which it is inflituted, to form a new government on principles most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence indeed will dictate, that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and all experience hath shewn that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are fufferable, than to right themfelves by abolishing the forms to which they have been accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, purfuing invariably the same object, evinces a defign to reduce them under absolute despotisin, it is their right, it is their duty to throw off fuch government, and provide new guards for their future fecurity. Such has been the patient fufferance of these Colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former fyslem of government. The History of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations; all having in direct object theestablishment of an absolute tyranny over these States." In proof of this affertion, they then proceed to enumerate the particulars of his conduct in relation to America, and the oppreffive and tyrannic acts of his reign. In conclusion they fay, "In every ftage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redrefs in the most humble terms: our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injuries. A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people. WE therefore, the Representatives of AMERICA in General Congress affembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name, and by the authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES, and that they are abfolved from all allegiance to the British Crown; and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is and ought to be totally diffolved: and in support of this declaration, we mutually pledge to each other, our lives, our fortunes, and our facred honor."

This DECLARATION was received in every part of the Continent with the loudest acclamations of applause. Amongst the most enraptured in this glorious moment of enthusiasm, was the heroic and romantic Lee, who, at this period, writing to Patrick Henry, Efq. Governor of Virginia, thus exultingly expresses himsels: "The reveries which I considered as mere golden castles built in the air, at length bid fair for being realized. We shall now most probably see a mighty empire established of freemen, whose honor, property, and military glories are not to be at the disposal of a sceptred tyrant, nor their consciences to be fettered by a proud domineering hierarchy. Every faculty of the soul will now be put in motion; every spark of ability which every individual possesses will now be brought forth, and form the common aggregate for the advantage and honor of the community."

By advice of the new American Minister, Lord George Germaine, the chief command of the vast naval and military force now collected for the fubjugation of America was entrusted to the Howes, brothers of the gallant Nobleman who fo glorioufly fell in the defence of the Colonies in the former war at Ticonderoga. " !! AMERICA," faid the Congress, in one of their public declarations, "is amazed to find the name of Howe in the catalogue of her enemics-fhe loved his brother." It argued, however, very shallow policy to make this nomination under the idea that the found of a once popular name would cause America to waver for a moment in her determination, or in the flightest degree remit her preparations of resistance; ance; though it might indeed be reasonably questioned, whether men supposed not unfavorably inclined to America, would be likely to make exertions equally vigorous and ardent with others not inferior in talents, who entertained no fuch predilection. Lord Howe, who was anxious to obtain an enlargement of his powers as Commiffioner, in order to effect his favorite purpose of pacification, did not leave England till May, and he then directed his course for Halifax, where he arrived in June; but found by a letter left forhim, that his brother, the General, was already departed for New York; to which place he instantly proceeded without coming to an anchor, and reached Staten Island, the head-quarters of the General, on the 12th of July. Here, to his inexpressible chagrin, he was informed of the publication of the Declaration of Independency. His Lordthip, however, refolved to make an effort, fuch as yet remained, for effecting an accommodation, though fo limited were his powers, that it was in fact of very immaterial consequence whether his arrival preceded or fucceeded the Declaration. On his arrival off the coaft, his Lordship had sent ashore by a flag to Amboy a circular letter addressed to the Governors of the different Colonies, acquainting them with his appointment as Commissioner, in conjunction with the General, together with a Declaration to the 0 4 Inhabitants.

Inhabitants. Copies of these papers were fent by General Washington to the Congress, who immediately refolved, "that they be published in the feveral Gazettes, in order that the good people of the United States might be apprized of what nature are the commissions, and what the terms, with the expectation of which the infidious Court of Great Britain has endeavoured to amufe and difarm them." Some days after this, Adjutant-General Paterion was deputed by General Howe with a meffage to General Washington, slating, that the Commissioners were invested with great powers, that they would derive the greatest pleasure from effecting an accommodation, and wished this visit to be confidered as the first advance towards that defirable object. General Washington replied, "that, by what had transpired, their powers extended merely to the granting of pardons; that those who had been guilty of no fault, wanted no pardon; and that they were only defending what they deemed their indifputable rights." Both fides now prepared ferioufly for action; and the General, being joined by the far greater part of his expected reinforcements, found himself at the head of 30,000 veteran troops, supported by a formidable fleet, compoling together a far superior force to any that had ever before been feen in the New World employed in the same service.

On

On the 22d of August 1776, the whole army being re-embarked, was fafely landed, under protection of the shipping, on the south-western extremity of Long Island, an extensive and fertile tract; on the opposite side of which, in view of the island and city of New York, lay encamped, near the village of Brooklyn, a large body of Americans commanded by General Sullivan. His lines extended on the left to the East River, which separated him from New York; he was defended by a marsh and an inlet of the sea called Gowan's Cove on the right; and to the rear of the encampment was an open bay, bounded by a small island, known by the name of Governor's Island. Between the armies was a range of hills covered with wood, interfecting the country from east to west: through these hills are three passes, one to the westward called the Narrows; a fecond, on the road denominated the Flat-bush road: and the third bending to the east, called the Bedford road. Besides these there is a road leading round the eastern extremity of the hills to a plantation called Jamaica. On each of these roads or passes the American General had placed a strong guard of 800 men. General Howe, having formed his plan, stationed General Grant at the head of the left wing, in a position to guard the coast, and, if practicable, to force a paffage through the Narrows. General De Heister, with the Hessians, was ordered to take post at the central pass of Flat-bush.

About nine in the evening of the 26th, the main army, under the command of General Clinton and the Lords Percy and Cornwallis, marched to the right, in order to gain the eastern or Jamaica pass, which, through the unaccountable negligence or cowardice of the officer appointed to defend it, they accomplished without delay or difficulty. The way being thus open, the whole army descended by the town of Bedford into the level country which lay between them and the American lines. The action began early on the morning of the 27th, by a warm cannonade on the right of the American lines from the Generals De Heister and Grant; the ships of war in the mean time attacking a battery at Red Hook, in the rear of the American encampment, in order to call off their attention from the left and centre where the real danger lay. The Americans, having taken a ftation fome miles distant in front of their camp, in order to oppose the advance of De Heister and Grant, were fuddenly attacked by General Clinton in the rear, and immediately thrown into the utmost confusion; and, in the effort to retreat back to the lines of Brooklyn, great numbers were killed or taken prisoners; amongst the latter was General Sullivan, and ten other Field Officers, and many were drowned or fuffocated in attempting to pass the marsh. Upon the whole, a signal victory was obtained with inconfiderable lofs; and 3 fuch was the ardor of the British troops, that scarcely could they be restrained by the too great caution of their Commander from storming the American lines, which would have been in all probability quickly forced, in the consternation occasioned by the loss of the battle. On the next day the British troops broke ground in form, at 600 yards distance from the nearest redoubt, and the ships in the Bay waited only a fair wind to enter the East River, which would have effectually cut off all communication between the Island and the Continent. In this fituation no hope remained but in a retreat, which was on the fucceeding night effected, under cover of a thick fog, with. extraordinary filence, order, and fecrecy; General Washington himself crossing over in person, and taking the conduct of the whole. clearing up of the fog, the last boats of the Americans were feen paffing the river, but out of reach of the English batteries; and General Howe, whose hopes had been raifed to the highest pitch, now found no other advantage resulting from his victory than the inglorious acquifition of the deferted works of Brooklyn. Almost immediately after this transaction, General Sullivan was fent upon parole, with a verbal meffage from Lord Howe to the Congress, importing, that although he could not at prefent treat with them in a legal character, yet he was defirous of conferring with some of the Members

Members of that Affembly in their individual capacity; informing them, "that he, with the General, was invested with full powers to compromise the dispute between Great Britain and America, on terms advantageous to both; the obtaining of which had detained him near two months, and prevented his arrival before the Declaration of Independency had taken place. If, upon the conference, any probable ground of accommodation appeared, his Lordship added, that the authority of Congress must of course be subsequently acknowledged, in order to render the compact complete." The Congress replied with republican dignity, rather raifing than lowering their tone in confequence of the late defeat, that "being the Representatives of the free and independent STATES of AMERICA, they could not with propriety fend any of their Members to confer with his Lordship in their private characters; but that, ever defirous of establishing peace on reasonable terms, they would fend a Committee of their body, to know whether he had any authority to treat with persons authorized by Congress, and what that authority is." The Committee appointed for this purpose, Dr. Franklin, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Rutledge, accordingly met Lord Howe upon Staten Island September 14, where they were entertained by his Lordship with great politeness; but in the report of this conference, they fay, "that his Lordship's commission commission appeared to them to contain no other authority of importance than was comprized in the Act of Parliament; for, as to the power of enquiring into the state of America, and transmitting the refult of fuch enquiry to England, they apprehend any expectation from the effect of fuch a power would have been too precarious for America to have relied upon, had fhe continued in her flate of dependence." Thus all hope of fuccess in confequence of negotiation vanished, much to the fatisfaction of the friends of American Independence, who dreaded left the powers vefted in the Commissioners should have proved so extensive as to create a ferious difference of opinion as to the propriety of treating; but this the abounding pride and deficient wisdom of the English Court most effectually prevented. No fuspension of arms having taken place, feveral ships of war were previous to the conference fent up the East and North Rivers, which lave the coasts of the long and narrow peninfula at the extremity of which the city of New York is fituated. The army of General Washington being stationed, part in the environs of the city, and part at Kingsbridge, on the ifthmus which connects the peninfula with the continent, apprehensions were entertained that the English General, by landing his forces in the centre, would cut off the communication between them; on which a refolution was taken, immediately mediately to evacuate the city; and on the actual landing of the British forces, the Americans retreated with precipitation and fome loss to Kingsbridge, where they had erected firong works. The greater part of the army were now re-embarked, and again. landed near West Chester, with a view to gain the rear of General Washington's encampment, and to enclose him in his fastnesses on all sides. American Commander, alarmed by the remonftrances of General Lee, who had recently joined him, perceived the necessity of making a grand movement, in order to counteract this project; and immediately decamping with his whole army, took a new and ftrong position at White Plains, the deep river Brunx covering his front, and the North river flowing at some distance in the rear.

On the 28th of October, the royal army advanced in two columns within cannon-shot of the American lines; and a part of the left wing, croffing the river, attacked an advanced post of the American encampment, commanded by General Macdougal, who was compelled to retreat with loss to the main army: the right and centre, fortunately for the Americans, did not quit the ground on which they had at first formed. The next day, General Howe, observing the American lines much strengthened by additional works, resolved to defer the attack till the arrival of the troops which had been left on York Island; who joining him at the expected time, new dispositions were made for attacking the American lines on the last day of October, but incessant rains prevented the execution of his plan; and in the night of the 1st of November, General Washington drew off his troops, and took another and ftill fironger position, amidst the woods and high lands bordering on the North Castle district. General Howe, perceiving that the nature of the country would not admit of forcing the American Commander to an engagement, made a fudden movement towards Kingsbridge, and unexpectedly invested Fort Washington, a strong post, which the Americans, contrary to the earnest advice of General Lee, occupied on the North River, opposite to which was Fort Lee on the Jersey side. The Commander of the fortress refusing to surrender to the summons of General Howe, it was by an immediate and vigorous affault carried fword in hand, and more than 2000 men made prisoners of war. On this acquifition, Lord Cornwallis was detached with a ftrong body of forces to form the investment of Fort Lee, but found it already abandoned by the garrison, who retired with such precipitation as to leave behind them their artillery, provisions, and flores. General Washington, who had passed the North River, with a view to the protection of the province of Jersey, now found himself compelled to retreat with a very diminished force to Newark, whence whence he fell back on the approach of Lord Cornwallis to Brunfwick, leaving Newark the very morning that his Lordship entered it. As the van of Lord Cornwallis's army advanced to Brunswick, by a forced march, December 1, General Washington retreated to Prince-town, having first broken down the bridge erected there over the Rariton. As the orders of his Lordship were positive not to advance beyond Brunswick, he here sent dispatches to the Commander in Chief, expressing fanguine hopes, that by a continued purfuit he could entirely disperse the army under General Washington, and seize his heavy baggage and artillery before he could pass the Delawar. But General Howe would not revoke his order, faying only, that he would join his Lordship immediately: but this junction did not take place till after an important interval of feveral days, and the Americans were once more faved by the cold and dilatory policy of the English General.

On the 7th, Lord Cornwallis advanced to Prince-town, which the Americans had fearcely quitted, and the van of his Lordship's army reached at midnight, December 8, the banks of the Delawar, just as the rear-guard of the Americans gained the opposite shore. Here a cessation of the pursuit became indispensable, as no boats could be procured for transporting the troops over that great river. During this memorable retreat, General Lee, at the head of a confiderable body of troops, had followed the track of Lord Cornwallis, but at too great a diffance to be of any fervice to the Commander in Chief. It feemed as if his proud and envious mind, which could brook no fuperiority, would have been gratified by the total defeat and ruin of General Washington, to whom he would, in all probability, have fucceeded as Generalissimo of the forces of America. But it was otherwise decreed, and an unlooked-for and unspeakable mortification and disgrace awaited him. While he lay carelessly and without a guard at a place called Basking-ridge, intelligence of his fituation was communicated to Colonel Harcourt, who inftantly formed a plan for capturing this able officer, flyled by the British army, "the American Palladium." With fuch address and activity was this project carried into execution, that the General was feized by a party of light horse, conducted by the Colonel in the night of the 13th of December 1776, and carried fafely off to the British Camp, though feveral guarded posts and armed patroles lay in their way. This capture caused great exultation, and the prisoner was confined in the closest manner. An offer being made by the Congress to exchange fix Field Officers for the General, it was answered, that General Lee, being a deserter from his Majesty's service, did not come under the denomination of a prisoner of war, nor was he enti-VOL. II. tled titled to the benefits of the cartel; and the menace of retaliation alone prevented their proceeding to the last extremity against him. During the royal successes in the Jerseys, General Clinton, with two brigades of British and two of Hessian troops, with a squadron of men of war, was detached to the attack of Rhode Island—which, being in no condition of desence, was abandoned to them without resistance. It was taken possession of by General Clinton on the very day that General Washington crossed the Delawar.

The affairs of America were now in the opinion of many verging to a crisis; for, though it might reasonably be expected that the first operations of fo great a force as that now employed by Great Britain would be successful in a certain degree, it could scarcely be imagined that such a series of difasters could happen in so short a time. But the event of the campaign, though now in appearance brought very nearly to a termination, shewed in a ftriking manner the caprice of fortune, and the folly of those who in a hazardous and dangerous war rely on a conftant and uninterrupted tide of When General Washington retreated across the Delawar, he trembled for the fate of America; and talked of retiring for fafety with the remains of his army to the recesses of the Alleghahany mountains, expecting to have been immediately followed by the British forces. For, though 14 the the boats were by a timely precaution removed to the Pennsylvanian shore, the neighbourhood supplied ample materials, which art and industry might! foon have conftructed into rafts and flotillas fufficient for the transportation of the troops. But it was remarked by men of differnment, that nothing of the vast or decisive appeared in the plans of the English General, and the troops now in the fullcareer of fuccess were ordered into winter cantonments, forming an extensive chain from Brunswick to the Delawar, and down the banks of that river for many miles, fo as to compose a front at the end of the line looking over to Pennfylvania. General Washington having perfect information of this difposition, exclaimed in the spirit of a vigilant and fagacious commander, "Now is the time to clip the wings of the enemy while they are fo fpread."

Very early in the morning of the 26th December (1776), a day purposely selected on the supposition that the preceding sessivity might savor the project of surprize, General Washington crossed the Delawar, not without extreme difficulty from the quantity of ice in the river, nine miles above Trenton, and immediately began his march in the midst of a storm of snow and hail at the head of his troops, which exceeded not three thousand in number, and reached Trenton by day-break. Here about one thousand six hundred men were stationed, chiefly Hessians, under the command of Colonel Rahl, who, being unsuspicious of danger, were thrown into confusion at the first attack. Colonel Rahl himself being mortally wounded, the diforder increased, and, abandoning their artillery, they attempted to make their retreat to Prince-town, but finding this impracticable, and being now overpowered, and nearly furrounded, the three regiments of Rahl, Lossberg, and Knyphausen, laid down their arms, and furrendered themselves prisoners of war; the remainder of the troops escaping with difficulty by way of Bordentown. In the evening General Washington repassed the Delawar, carrying with him the prisoners, their artillery, and colors, and entered the city of Philadelphia in triumph. The charm was now diffolved; and it being found by experience that the Europeans were not invincible, great numbers of the Americans, who had deferted their colors, again repaired to the standard of their commander, who foon found himfelf at the head of a confiderable army, in a condition once more to cross the Delawar; and Lord Cornwallis, who was actually at New York in his way to England, found himself under a necessity of returning to the defence of the Jerseys.

The English General, approaching the American army strongly posted near the town of Trenton, made immediate dispositions for an attack; but in the dead of night (January 2, 1777), General Washington silently withdrew his troops, leaving fires burning in his camp, and the usual patroles, in order to deceive the enemy; and by a circuitous march arrived by fun-rife at Prince-town. Here the fourth brigade of British troops, consisting of the feventeenth, fortieth, and fifty-fifth regiments, were posted under the command of Colonel Mawhood, who had just begun his march in order to join Lord Cornwallis, when he fell in with the van-guard of the American army. Though engaged with a far fuperior force, the Colonel, at the head of his own corps, with extraordinary gallantry fought his way through the thickest ranks of the enemy-the other regiments making separate retreats by different roads: they fuffered however very feverely in this unequal conflict, and were in a great measure difabled for future fervice. General Washington diftinguished himself on this occasion by fignal exertions of personal valour. On this disafter, Lord Cornwallis, finding himfelf out-manœuvred by his antagonift, abandoned his camp at Trenton, and retired with precipitation to Brunswick. The licentious ravages of the foldiery, particularly of the German mercenaries, during the time they were in possession of the Jerseys, had excited the utmost refentment and detestation of the inhabitants; and the fortune of war now feeming to turn against them, the whole country rose in arms: the Militia collected in large bodies, and the British troops were every where attacked with fuccess-at Woodbridge, at Elizabeth-town, at Newark; and the royal troops retained only the two posts of Brunswick and Amboy, both holding an open communication with New York by sea.—In the detail of military operations, the civil transactions which took place during the campaign must not be suffered to escape our attention.

On the 19th September (1776), the Commisfioners of the Crown, Lord Howe and the General: caused a proclamation to be published, promising in his Majesty's name a revision of all such instructions as might be construed to lay an improper restraint on the freedom of legislation in the Colonies, and also to concur in the revisal of such Acts by the operation of which they might think themfelves aggrieved. Though it was impossible to conjecture what was really meant by a promife fo vague, had a declaration of this nature been made with good faith at an earlier period of the dispute, it might doubtless have been attended with happy effects; but when a civil war had actually commenced, to indulge the most distant idea that the Americans would lay down their arms on the mere promife of a revision of the acts of that government whose authority they had renounced, was an idle and puerile expectation.

In the month of October the inhabitants of the city and island of New York, then in the possession of the English, presented a petition to the Commis-fioners,

fioners, figned by nine hundred and forty-fix names, declaring their allegiance to the King, and their acknowledgement of the Constitutional Supremacy of Great Britain; and praying to be reftored to his Majesty's peace and protection. This petition was followed by another of a fimilar kind from Queen's County, in Long Island; but the example afforded little encouragement to others, when it was obferved that these petitions were wholly unavailing: nor were they ever reflored to the rights which they had been flattered by the proclamation with the expectation of regaining. On the 30th of November another proclamation was published by the Commissioners, offering a pardon and indemnity to all persons who should within the space of fixty days furrender themselves to any of his Majefty's general officers, admirals, &c. and fubscribe a declaration of loyalty and obedience. This proclamation being iffued during the high tide of fuccefs attending the royal arms, very many persons, timid or treacherous, subscribed the declaration accordingly; but at no time did the Congress discover any symptoms of irrefolution. They removed indeed their fession from Philadelphia to Baltimore, in Maryland, where they adopted very vigorous measures both of offence and defence. They declared the property of the fubjects of Great Britain taken on the high feas to be lawful prize; they refolved upon raifing eighty-eight battalions . atmire to ferve during the war; they nominated three of their body, of whom Dr. Franklin was one, Commissioners to the Court of Versailles, to solicit aid and affiftance, and to propose the plan of a treaty of friendship, commerce, and alliance; they enlarged the powers of their General, vefting in him a kind of dictatorial authority for the space of fix months; and they resolved that all bills of credit emitted by Congress should pass current in all transactions, and whoever refused to receive the same in the common course of payment should be deemed an enemy to the liberties of America, and should be treated accordingly. Such was the state of America at the termination of the campaign of 1776, which, though late in its commencement, and short in its duration, abounded in action, and exhibited viciffitudes of fortune fingularly important and interesting.

The intelligence of the fuccesses attending the British arms on Long Island and at New York reached England some time before the meeting of Parliament, which was convened October 31, 1776. In his speech from the Throne, the King, with unguarded and tindignisted intemperance of language, informed the two Houses, if that so daring and desperate was the spirit of those leaders whose object has always been dominion and power, that they have now openly renounced all allegiance to the Crown, and all political connection with this country;

country; they have rejected, with circumstances of indignity and infult, the means of conciliation held out to them, and have PRESUMED to fet up their REBELLIOUS CONFEDERACIES AS INDEPENDENT STATES. If their TREASON be suffered to take root, much mischief must grow from it to the prefent tystem of all Europe." His Majesty was happy to inform them, "that the fuccesses already obtained had been fo important as to give the strongest hopes of the most decisive good consequences; but, notwithstanding this fair prospect, it was necessary at all events to prepare for ANOTHER CAMPAIGN." Addresses, the echo of the speech, were brought forward in both Houses; but an amendment, which was in reality another; address in a totally different strain, was moved by Lord John Cavendish in the House of Commons, and the Marquis of Rockingham in the House of Lords, containing a masterly recapitulation of the manifold errors of that fystem which had caused the entire alienation, and at length the open revolt of fo large a part of his Majesty's once loyal and affect tionate subjects. It concluded with the observation, "that a wife and provident use of the late advantages might be productive of happy effects, as the means of establishing a permanent connection between Great Britain and her Colonies, on principles of liberty, and terms of mutual benefit!" "We should look;" faid this truly excellent and admirable events that should bow them to an abject and unconditional submission to any power whatsoever annihilate their diberties, and subdue them to fervile principles and passive habits by the mere force of foreign mercenary arms."

The fpeech from the Throne, under the eftablished and decorous pretext of its being the speech of the Minister, was treated with the most contemptuous and farcastic severity. "Where," it was asked, "are those mighty leaders to be found whom the Americans obey for implicitly, and who govern them with fo despotic a rule? They have no grandees among them; their foil is not productive of nobility; in no country are there in fact to few individuals possessed of a commanding or extensive influence; the President of their supreme Assembly is a merchant; the General of their armies a private gentleman. Nothing could be more evident than that a fense of common danger and of common fuffering had driven them to the necessity of creating leaders, who were postfeffed only of fuch powers as the people had thought it expedient to entrust them with. In the same fpirit of FALSEHOOD it is afferted, " that the Americans had rejected with circumstances of indignity and infult the terms of conciliation offered them." The truth was, that no terms had been offered them but the offer of pardon on unconditional fubsiden = 1: mission, miffion, which the Ministers well knew they would never accept; nor was even this mock offer made till the whole fystem of irritation and oppression was completed by the injustice and cruelty of the Capture Act; by which they were put out of the protection of the law, and their property held out as common spoil. The position in the speech, so undeniably true, "that no people ever enjoyed greater happiness, or lived under a milder Government, than these now revolted Colonies," implied the severest cenfure on those who had so wantonly and wickedly departed from a fystem which had produced fuch noble and wonderful effects. The expectation of unanimity from the present situation of affairs was, however, faid to be of all the parts of this extravagant speech the most ridiculous. "" What! fhall we at last concur in measures, because all the mischiefs which we originally predicted have ultimately refulted from them? Have Ministers the unparalleled effrontery to call upon us to give our fanction to that fatal fystem which we in vain warned and implored them to fhun, and which perfifted in must terminate in utter ruin?" On a division, the amendment was rejected in the House of Commons by a majority of 242 to 87, and in the House of Peers by 91 to 26, fourteen of whom joined in a protest, in which the proposed amendment was verbatim inferted in order that it might remain as a perpetual memorial on the Journals of that House.

In a few days after the addresses were presented, Lord John Cavendish, exhibiting in the House a printed paper, purporting to be a proclamation of his Majesty's Commissioners in America, called upon Ministers to inform him as to the authenticity of it. This being acknowledged, his Lordship expreffed in the ftrongest terms his astonishment at the contempt and indignity offered to the House, who, through the medium of a common newspaper only, were at length informed that they stand engaged to America to undertake a revision of all those laws by which the Americans had conceived themselves to be aggrieved. Notwithstanding the refentment he felt as a Member of the House at this ministerial insolence of conduct, his Lordship faid that he felt a dawn of joy break in upon his mind at the bare mention of reconciliation, whatever color the measures might wear that led to fo defirable an event. The great object of reftoring peace and unity to this distracted empire outweighed fo far with him all other present considerations, that he not only would overlook punctilios on this account, but even fuch matters of real import as would upon any other occasion call all-his powers into action. On these grounds his Lordfhip moved, "that the House should resolve itself into a Committee to confider of the revifal of all Acts of Parliament by which his Majesty's subjects in 'America think themselves aggrieved." Ministers, Ministers, though thrown by the surprize of this motion into some perplexity, alleged in their vindication, "that the paper in question was not of fufficient moment to be laid before Parliament, being no treaty nor-part of a treaty, but barely a preliminary, which might possibly lead to one. That a public proclamation, submitted to the general infpection upon the walls and houses of New York, could not however be intended to be kept from the knowledge of Parliament; and they conceived the authority exercised by the Commissioners to be already delegated by the Act under which they derived their powers-that, as to the motion itself, they conceived it to be highly improper, as tending to difgrace the Commissioners, and defeat their endeavours to obtain the most advantageous terms for this kingdom. They also insisted that, until the spirit of independency was effectually subdued, it would be idle and futile to enter upon any revisions; but from our late successes there was little room to doubt but that the cruel thraldom in which the people of America were held by the Congress would be quickly diffolved, and that America would return to her duty with more eagerness and alacrity than she had entered into this revolt; and that then would be the time to talk of legislative regulations for their future government."

This language kindled anew the indignation of the Opposition. "That the most important paper published published in the course of this controversy, containing propositions of conciliation in which the House were parties so nearly concerned, should not be thought of fufficient moment to be laid before them, was treated as an incredible extravagance; and to pretend that the Commissioners were already authorized to engage for the revision of the laws in question, was a palpable falsehood. The Act by which they were appointed empowered them only to grant pardons, and enquire into grievances; and the concurrence of the House was absolutely necessary to give effect to the proclamation. the Ministers opposed such concurrence, it was evident that the offer was a branch of that infidious and treacherous fystem by which they aimed to divide, while by their fleets and armies they were endeavouring to destroy and exterminate the Co-To fay that this proclamation was not intended to be kept from the knowledge of Parliament, was a mockery of Parliament; for how could the Members of that House be supposed acquainted with the papers posted up in the streets of New York?" But the doctrine they most of all reprobated, was, that an absolute and unconditional renunciation of American Independence must precede the revision of the laws in question, or any redrefs of grievances whatever. "Upon what precedent," faid they, "is this horrid maxim founded? or what code of history or policy have our Minis-1, ... 1 . 31, 1 ters ters made the rule of their present conduct? Philip II. of Spain, who was in his day confidered as the most gloomy and unrelenting tyrant in Christendom; adopted a wifer and more moderate policy. In his wars with the revolted provinces of Holland, he repeatedly promifed in terms the most explicit and positive; the complete redress of all their grievances, without requiring a previous renunciation of their independence. But the doctrine now broached was a doctrine which led to the last extremities of human misery. It was a condition which could not be enforced without the effusion of oceans of blood, and in fact it was holding out to America the option only of SLAVERY or DEATH." The motion, after a long and paffionate debate, was negatived by a majority of 62 voices: and from this time many of the Opposition, chiefly of the Rockingham party, abfented themselves from the House, and a clear field was left during the greater part of the fession to the Ministersthe vaft fupplies demanded by them being granted in almost empty houses, without examination or debate.

A gloomy filence prevailed, and Ministers in the height of their parliamentary triumphs were ill able to counterfeit the external appearances of fatisfaction. The Members of the Secession, in vindication of themselves, urged "that there was no faving a people against their will; that they had for a fuccession of years apprised and warned the nation of the dangers attending those ruinous meafures which it was purfuing, and of the fatal precipice that must terminate this mad ministerial career-it was too degrading to be the continual instruments of opposing the ineffective weapons of reason and argument to a system of pre-determined irritation and violence—that as good and bad fuccess were equally urged, and alike admitted, as motives for a perseverance in this course, it was not the part of wifdom to strive with impossibilities, or to draw upon themselves the odium of their fellowcitizens by an ineffectual attempt to ferve themthat they would therefore referve their exertions for a feafon when the prefent national delirium had so far abated as to afford some hope of advantage."

Soon after the recess the Minister, depending perhaps on the present indisposition of the minority to contest any point whatever with the Court, introduced a Bill to enable his Majesty to secure and detain persons charged with or SUSPECTED of the crime of High Treason committed in America, or on the High Seas. With such negligent latitude, or, to speak more justly, with such treacherous artistice of construction, was this Bill framed, that, by the enacting clauses, the Crown was enabled, at its pleasure, to commit any person resident in any part of the British dominious to custody, without bail or mainprize, mainprize, under his Majesty's fign manual, in any place of confinement fituate in Great Britain or ELSEWHERE. For though the act of treason; according to the proposed Bill, must be committed in America, the Crown lawyers and the King's friends maintained, and cases were quoted to prove, that fuch treasonable act might be perpetrated by perfons who had never been out of the kingdom, if its operation could be subsequently shewn to extend to America. Thus was the Habeas-Corpus Act, that great bulwark of British liberty, completely annihilated by a vile and infamous conftruction of Jaw, which left it in the power of the Crown to apprehend on the flightest suspicion, or pretence of fuspicion, any individual against whom the vengeance of the Court was meant to be directed; and to convey them beyond the feas to any of the garrisons in Africa or the Indies, far from all hope or possibility of relief. The alarm occasioned by this Bill brought back the Members of the Opposition to the House, and a most resolute, vigorous, and animated refistance was made to it in every stage of its progress. At length the Minister, who really appears not to have been thoroughly apprized of the nature of the Bill, and of the dreadful extent of the powers vested by it in the Crown, frankly and explicitly disayowed as to himself all design of extending the operation of the Bill beyond its open and avowed objects. He faid, "that the Bill was Vol. II. a intended intended for America, and not for England; that, as he would ask for no power that was not wanted, fo he would fcorn to receive it by any covert means: and that, far from wishing to establish any unconstitutional precedent, he neither sought nor wished any powers to be vested in the Crown or its Ministers which were capable of being employed to bad or oppressive purposes." He therefore agreed to receive the amendments proposed; the principal of which were in substance: 1. That the clause empowering his Majesty to confine such persons as might be apprehended under this Act in any part of bis dominions, should be modified by the infertion of the words, " within the realm;" and adly, That an additional clause or proviso be inserted, "that nothing in this Act shall be construed to extend to persons resident in Great Britain." These concessions gave extreme offence to the leaders of the High Prerogative party, who had zealously defended the Bill in its original state, and who now exclaimed, "that they were deferted by the Minister in a manner which seemed calculated to disgrace the whole measure, to confirm all the charges and furmifes of their adverfaries, and to fix all the odium upon them." And it was indeed fufficiently evident from the whole conduct of the business, that the Minister, on this as on other occasions, was not admitted into the inmost recesses of the Royal Cabinet.

On the oth of April 1777, a meffage was delivered by the Minister from the King, in which his Majesty expressed his concern in acquainting the House with the difficulties he labored under from the debts incurred by expences of the Civil Government, amounting on the 5th of January preceding, to upwards of 600,000l. And the House on this message resolving itself into a Committee of Supply, the Minister moved, "That the fum of 618,000l. be granted, to enable his Majesty to discharge the debts of the Civil Government; and that the fum of 100,000l. per annum, over and above the fum of 800,000l. be granted as a farther provision for the same." This gave rife to a vehement debate. It was affirmed to be a measure of the groffest impropriety and indecency to bring forward fuch a demand in fuch a feason of national distress and calamity; when burdens are accumulated upon burdens, to tell a people already finking under their load, that the grandeur of the Crown is not fufficiently fupported; and that an increase of taxes is necessary in order to increase its splendor! But even this plea, however inadequate to the justification of Ministers, was far remote from the truth. It was notorious that the debt had been incurred in carrying on and supporting a system of corruption; in obtaining that baneful and unbounded influence which had fwept every thing before it; which had Q 2 brought brought the nation to the brink of destruction, and had deprived us in a very great measure of all the benefits derived from a limited government. The harsh and stern voice of Prerogative was indeed no longer heard; but the danger was much greater from the filent progress of a malady, which, though flower, was far more certain. They faid, that the debts of the Crown had been not many years fince discharged without account, to the amount of more than half a million. What is the consequence? Another and larger demand is made, and a vast annual increase asked, without even the wretched fecurity of Ministerial promise, that new debts will not be contracted, and new augmentations demanded. They observed, that, on a comparison of the expenditure of the last eight years, with a fimilar period terminating the reign of the late King, the excess of the article of Pensions would be found to amount to 213,000l. and that the increase in the article of Secret Service was yet more enormous. In two lines only, the fums of 171,000l. and 114,000l. were charged for fecret fervices, iffued under the direction of the Secretaries of the Treasury. That money should be entrusted to the Sccretaries of State, for the purpose of procuring foreign intelligence, must doubtless be acknowledged necessary; but that the subordinate officers of the Treasury, who can have no public connection beyond their own office, should be the avowed avowed irresponsible agents for the unlimited difpofal of the public money, was indeed alarming; and left no room for doubt as to its defign or application. Above half a million was flated under the head of the Board of Works, though no one could conjecture on what palace, park, garden; or royal work of any kind the money had been expended; nor were any vouchers produced by , which the House could form a judgment of the propriety of any branch of the expenditure. It appeared only upon the whole, that under every head the expence was infinitely increased, while the external splendor of royalty was in the same proportion diminished. The accounts laid upon the table flated the annual allowance for the privy purse to be raised from 48,000l. in the late reign to 60,000l. and, what was much more extraordinary, it appeared that the Queen's privy purfe was fixed at 50,000l. although Queen Ann, reigning as Sovereign in her own right, had contented herfelf with an allowance of 20,000l.—Such nevertheless was the unlimited complaisance of Parliament, that the demands of the Minister were granted almost without the formality of a division*.

^{* &}quot;When we fee," fays a humorous writer, "the print of GARAGANTUA, that has a mouth as large as an oven, and swallows at one meal twelve hundred pounds of bread, twenty oxen, a hundred sheep, fix hundred fowls, fifteen hundred hares, two thousand quails, a thousand barrels of wine, fix thousand peaches, &c. &c. who does not say: That is the mouth of a King?"

The opposition in the House of Lords was equally unavailing. The Bill was, however, accompanied with a strong protest; but the most remarkable circumstance attending it, was the speech made by the Speaker of the House of Commons to his Majesty, on presenting it a few days afterwards for the royal affent. "In a time, SIR," faid he, " of public diffress, full of difficulty and danger, their Conftituents laboring under burdens almost too heavy to be borne, your faithful Commons, postponing all other business, have not only granted to your Majesty a large present supply, but also a very great additional revenue, great beyond example, great beyond your Majesty's highest expense; but all this, SIR, they have done in the well-grounded confidence, that you will apply wifely what they have granted liberally." The countenance of the King plainly indicated how little acceptable was this unexpected liberty. On the return of the Speaker and the attendant Members, the thanks of the House were nevertheless immediately voted him; yet not without exciting the fecret and acrimonious refentment of the King's friends, or Prerogative party; one of whom, Mr. Rigby, took occasion in a subfequent debate to arraign the conduct of the Speaker with unufual vehemence, as conveying little less than an infult on the King, and as equally misrepresenting the sense of Parliament and

and the state of the Nation. The sentiments delivered at the bar of the other House, he said. were not those of the House of Commons; he for one totally disclaimed them; and he had no doubt but the majority of the House thought with him. The Speaker appealed to the vote of thanks which had been passed, as a proof that he had not been guilty of the misrepresentation imputed to him: and the Minister, uneasy at the altercation, intimated his wish that the subject might not be farther discussed. But Mr. Fox, immediately rising. declared, "that a ferious and direct charge having been brought, the question was now at issue. Either the Speaker had misrepresented the sense of the House, or he had not. He should therefore, in order to bring this question to a proper and final decifion, move, that the Speaker of the House, in his speech to his Majesty at the bar of the House of Peers, did express with just and proper energy the fentiments of this House." The Speaker himself declared, "that he would fit no. longer in that Chair than he was supported in the free exercise of his duty. He had discharged what he conceived to be his duty, intending only to express the sense of the House; and from the vote of approbation with which he had been how nored, he had reason to believe, he was not chargeable with any mifreprefentation." The Ministers) now found themselves involved in a most unpleafant dilemma, and in preffing terms recommended the withdrawment of the motion. This being positively refused, Mr. Rigby moved for the House to adjourn. But the House appearing evidently fensible of the degradation which its dignity must fustain from any affront offered to the Chair, he at length thought fit in some degree to concede; and professed, "that he meant no reflection upon the character of the Speaker, but that what he had faid was the mere expression of his private opinion, and the refult of that freedom of speech which was the right and privilege of every Member of that House, without respect of persons; and that, if what he had advanced was not agreeable to the fense of that House, he would readily withdraw his motion of adjournment:" which being done, Mr. Fox's motion was unanimously carried; and, to complete the triumph, the thanks of the House to the Speaker for his conduct in this affair were also moved, and agreed to without opposition.

The fession being now near its close, Lord Chatham, unwilling that it should pass over without some public testimony of his unutterable abhorrence of the war which now distracted and convulsed the empire, and of the principles and conduct of those men whose weak and wicked counsels had involved the nation in its present calamities, attended the House of Peers on the 30th of

May, wrapped in flannels, and bearing a crutch in each hand. At the risk of his health, and perhaps of his life, this great Statesman presented himself thus oppressed with infirmities, for the purpose of moving their Lordships, who had been previously fummoned, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, most humbly to advise his Majesty, to take the most speedy and effectual measures for putting a stop to the present unnatural war against the Colonies, upon the only just and folid foundation, anamely, the removal of accumulated grievances." His Lordship said, that he had at different times made different propositions, adapted to the circumstances in which they were offered. The plan contained in the former Bill was at this time, he confessed, impracticable. "The present motion will open the way for treaty." It will be the harbinger of peace, and will convince the Americans, that Parliament is fincerely difposed to reconciliation. We have tried for unconditional fubmiffion-let us now try what can be gained by unconditional redrefs. The door of mercy has been hitherto thut against them; you have ranfacked every corner of Germany for boors and ruffians to invade and ravage their country; for to conquer it, my Lords, is impossible—you CANNOT do it. I may as well pretend to drive them before me with THIS CRUTCH. I am experienced in fpring hopes and vernal promifes, but at last will come your equinoctial disappointment. But were it practicable by a long continued course of fuccess to conquer America, the holding it in fubjection afterwards will be utterly impossible. No benefit can be derived from that country to this, but by the goodwill and pure affection of the inhabitants: this is not to be gained by force of arms; their affection is only to be recovered by reconciliation and justice. If Ministers are founded in faying, that no engagements are entered into by America with France, there is yet a moment left; the point of honor is still safe; a few weeks may decide our fate as a nation. Were America fuffered to form a treaty with France, we should not only lose the immense advantages refulting from the vast and increasing commerce of our Colonies, but those advantages would be thrown into the hands of our hereditary enemy. America, my Lords, is now contending with Great Britain under a MASKED BATTERY of France, which will open as the perceives this country to be fufficiently weakened by the contest. France will not lose so fair an opportunity of separating for ever America from this kingdom. This is the critical moment—for fuch a treaty must and will take place, should pacification be delayed: and war between England and France is not the lefs probable because professions of amity continue to be made. It would be folly in France

France to declare it now, while America gives fullemployment to our arms, and is pouring into her lap her wealth and produce. While the trade of Great Britain languishes, while her taxes increase and her revenues diminish. France is securing and drawing to herfelf that commerce which is the basis of your power. My motion was stated generally, that I might leave the question at large to the wisdom of your Lordships. But, my Lords, I will tell you fairly what I wish for-I wish for a repeal of every oppressive Act passed since 1763; I would put America precifely on the footing she stood at that period. If it be asked, Why should WE fubmit to concede? I will tell you, my Lords: Because you have been the aggressors from the beginning; you ought, therefore, to make the first overture. I fay again, my Lords, you have been the aggreffors, you have made descents upon their coasts, you have burnt their towns, plundered their country, made war upon the inhabitants, confiscated their property, proscribed and imprisoned their persons;—you have injured, oppressed, and endeavoured to enslave them. America is therefore entitled to redrefs. Let then reparation come from the hand that inflicted the injuries; let conciliation fucceed to oppression; and I maintain, that Parliament will again recover its authority; that his Majesty will be once more enthroned in the hearts of his subjects; and that your your Lordships, as contributing to so great, benignant, and glorious an event, will receive the prayers and benedictions of every part of the British empire." The Peers in Administration repeated upon this occasion their accustomed arguments against concessions of any kind, as an acknowledgement of weakness on our part, which would excite the contempt of our friends, and foster the malice of our encmies. They positively denied any danger from France, and afferted, that " the affiftance given to the Americans proceeded neither from the Court nor the Ministers. but from the spirit of military enterprise and commercial adventure; and finally, that the motion arraigned in the most improper terms measures which had received the fanction of Parliament." On a division, the numbers were 99 to 28 Peers who supported the question.

On the 7th of June, 1777, the session was terminated, and his Majesty expressed in his speech his entire approbation of the conduct of Parliament, lavishing upon them high and slattering compliments for the unquestionable proofs they had given of their CLEAR DISCERNMENT of the TRUE INTERESTS of their COUNTRY.

During the feffion, a Memorial, in a very unufual ftyle, was delivered by Sir Joseph Yorke, Ambassador at the Hague, to the States General, in which his Excellency declared, "That the King, his mafter, had hitherto borne with unexampled patience the irregular conduct of the fubjects of their High Mightinesses, in their interested commerce at St. Eustatia, as also in America. If, faid the Ambaffador, the measures which your High Mightinesses have thought proper to take, had been as efficacious as your affurances have been amicable, the underfigned would not now have been under the necessity of bringing to the cognizance of your High Mightinesses, facts of the most serious nature. His Excellency then proceeds to state, that M. Van Graaf, Governor of St. Eustatia, had permitted the seizure of an Engglish vessel, by an American pirate, within cannon that of the island: and that he had returned from the fortress of his government the salute of a rebel flag: and the Ambaffador concludes, with demanding, in his Majesty's name, and by his express order, from their High Mightinesses, a formal difavowal of the falute by Fort Orange at St. Eustatia to the rebel ship, and the dismission and immediate recall of the Governor Van Graaf: declaring farther, that until fuch fatisfaction is given, they are not to expect, that his Majesty will suffer himself to be amused by mere assurances, or that he will delay one inftant to take fuch measures as he shall think due to the interest and dignity of his Crown."

The States, highly offended at the imperious language of this Memorial, would give no answer whatever to the Ambaffador, but ordered Count Welderen, their Resident in London, to deliver into the King of England's own hand a Counter-Memorial, in which they complain of the menacing tone that reigns throughout that of the English Court, such as ought not to take place between Sovereign and Independent Powers; adding, however, "that, from the fole motive of demonstrating their regard to his Majesty, they have actually dispatched orders to M. De Graaf, to render himself within the Republic without delay, in order to give the necessary information respecting his conduct; nor do they fcruple to difavow, in the most express manner, any act or mark of honour which may have been given by their officers to any veffels belonging to the Colonies of America, so far as it may imply a recognition of American Independence." The King thought proper to declare himself satisfied with these concesfions, but the utmost coolness from this time subsisted between the Courts of London and the Hague.

The acrimony displayed on this occasion by the former, may be without doubt imputed in a great degree to the extreme offence taken, previous to the interchange of these Memorials, at the refusal of the States to part with the Scots brirade in their fervice, at the defire of the King of England, fignified by a letter written to their High Mightinesses in his own hand. "In what an odious light must this unnatural civil war appear to all Europe?" faid one of the Deputies of the Province of Overyffel, M. Vander Capelle, in the debate which arose on this subject. "More odious still would it appear for a nation to take part therein who have fuccessfully refisted oppression, and fought themselves free. Superlatively detestable must it appear to those who, like me, regard the Americans as a brave people, engaged in defending those rights which they derive from God, not from the Legislature of Great Britain. For the purpose of suppressing such a revolt, or, as some please to call it, such a rebellion as this, I had rather fee janissaries hired than the subjects of a free ftate."

The CAMPAIGN of 1777, in America, commenced early in the spring, by the destruction of a considerable magazine of stores at a place called Courtland-Manor, on the banks of the North River, by a detachment under Colonel Bird, and another at Danbury, by another corps conducted by General Tryon, late Governor of New York, who was attacked on his return by a large body of provincials, led by Colonel now General Arnold, and suffered in his retreat great loss. Arnold on this as on all occasions distinguished himself by acts of extraordinary personal personal valor. His horse being shot under him, he with difficulty disengaged himself; and, seeing a foldier at the same moment with fixed bayonet advancing towards him, he drew out a piftol and fhot him dead on the fpot. The Americans on their part retaliated by an attack on an English post and magazine at Saggs Harbor, in Long Island, where they destroyed a large quantity of stores, and burnt a number of floops and other veffels lying in the harbor, with inconfiderable lofs. Lord Cornwallis continued in his flation at Amboy, watched and straitened in a manner which exposed the troops to the hardships of a most severe and unremitting duty, though lately strengthened by a brigade of British, and some companies of grenadiers and light infantry from Rhode Island. The order for these troops was sent by General now SIR WILLIAM HOWE (the "blufhing honors" of the Bath having been recently conferred upon him in reward of his fervices) to Lord Percy, in the abfence of General Clinton. His Lordship did not immediately comply, but returned for answer, "that the enemy were collecting a large force near Providence, with which circumstance he supposed General Howe to be unacquainted:" adding, "that he thought it his duty to represent the danger that might refult from fending away fo large a corps." General Howe replied, "that Lord Percy knew the consequence of disobedience of orders—trial by court-court-martial and certain fentence of being broke, and infifted upon his orders being punctually obeyed."

From fome extraordinary and unaccountable negligence, the army at New York were not able to take the field till June, for want of tents and camp equipage; which at length arriving, General Howe passed over in full force into the Jerseys, with a fixed intention if possible to bring the American commander to a general action; but on approaching his camp at Middlebrook, it was found absolutely inaccessible, from the nature of its fituation and its artificial defences. Every manœuvre was practifed by the English General to induce his antagonist to relinquish this advantageous station, but in vain. A feint was made of leaving the American army in the rear, and marching directly to the Delawar; but the American Fabrus was not to be deceived. "Had their defign," faid he, in his letter of the 17th of June, "been in the first inftance to crofs the Delawar, they would probably have made a ftraight rapid march towards it, and not have halted as they have done to awaken our attention, and give us time to make every preparation for obstructing them." At length General Howe decamped fuddenly in the night of the 20th, and retreated to Brunswick. On the 22d he fell back to Amboy, being much haraffed in his whole line of march by the advanced parties of the enemy.

Vol. II.

General Washington himself, quitting his strong camp at Middlebrook, moved with his army to Quibble-town, that he might be nearer the royal forces, and might act according to circumstances. The English commander, who had actually thrown a bridge over the channel which feparates the continent from Staten Island, and part of whose troops had already paffed over, now made a rapid march by different routes back into the Jerseys, in the hope of furprifing General Washington at Quibbletown; but on the first intelligence of this movement, the American General, penetrating the defign, re-possessed himself of his former strong pofition at Middlebrook:-and knowing that Lord Cornwallis at the head of a ftrong detached corps was advancing by a circuitous route to the right, he fortified the passes of the mountains on that fide of his camp; fo that Lord Cornwallis, who had defeated in his march a confiderable body of the enemy under Lord Sterling, and who hoped to have co-operated with General Howe by fecuring the passes in the rear, was compelled reluctantly to retire.

The whole plan of attack being thus frustrated, General Howe came to a second and final resolution of evacuating the Jerseys; and in both his retreats such havock, spoil, and ruin, were made by the forces under his personal inspection and command, as were well calculated to obviate the sufpicion picion that any fecret partiality to America yet remained in the breaft of the English General.

A great part of the fummer had now elapfed, and the primary object of the campaign had proved wholly abortive. In vindication of the conduct of Sir William Howe it was alleged, that to bring the enemy to action was impossible; and to advance to the Delawar, through a country entirely hoftile, and with fuch a force in his rear, would be no better than madness. But if so, the war itself was evidently no better than madness, as these difficulties were precifely fuch as they had every reafon previously to expect. Another project, however, was now to be tried, and preparations were made for a grand naval expedition. On the 23d of July the whole army, leaving only a fufficient force for the defence of New York, embarked on board the fleet, and after a long and tedious voyage the troops were landed at Elk Ferry, at the head of Chesapeak Bay, General Washington, who had for many weeks been kept in anxious suspense as to the deftination of the British army, upon this intelligence took possession of the heights on the eastern side of the river Brandywine, which falls into the Delawar below Philadelphia, with an intention to difpute the passage. By day-break on the 11th of September the British army advanced in two columns, the right, commanded by General Knype hausen, marching directly to Chadsford; and the R2 other other column, under Lord Cornwallis, taking a circuit to the left, in order to cross the forks of the Brandywine, and attack the enemy on the right flank. Both were in a confiderable degree fuccessful; the first after a severe conflict forcing the pasfage of the ford, and the latter furprifing and totally discomfiting the brigades commanded by Sullivan, which composed the right wing of the American army. The approach of night prevented the royal army from purfuing its advantages, and the lofs of the Americans did not exceed thirteen hundred men in killed, wounded, and prisoners; to which that of the British bore a very large proportion. The Marquis de la Fayette, a young French nobleman, who had recently entered as a volunteer into the American fervice, and Count Pulawski, a native of Poland, diftinguished themselves by their gallantry on this occasion. General Washington, on the difaster of Brandywine, retreated towards Philadelphia; but on the advance of General Howe, not deeming it expedient so soon to risk a second engagement, he withdrew, and the English army passed the Schuylkil without opposition; and on the 26th of September General Howe entered Philadelphia in triumph, the Congress having previously removed their fittings to York-town in Virginia. About the same time a detached corps of Americans, commanded by General Wayne, was furprifed and totally routed by Major General

Grey, at the head of two regiments and a body of light infantry. The attack being made with fixed bayonets, the execution was terrible.

No fooner was it known to Lord Howe that the English army was in possession of Philadelphia, than he moved round with the fleet from the Chefapeak to the Delawar, the navigation of which the Americans had endeavoured to render impracticable by works and batteries constructed on a low marshy island, formed near the junction of the Delawar and the Schuylkil; and on the opposite fhore, by a firong fort erected at a place called Red-bank. Across the mid-channel they had in various parts funk vast machines, composed of transverse beams firmly united and pointing in various directions, ftrongly headed with iron, to which, from the refemblance of form, the appellation was given of chevaux-de-frize. The head-quarters of the army at this time were at a place called German-town, fix miles from Philadelphia-the encampment croffing the village at right angles about the centre. General Washington, who was posted in a ftrong position at the distance of about sixteen miles on the banks of the Schuylkil, and who had kept a watchful eye on the movements of the enemy, thinking this a favorable opportunity of attack, decamped in the evening of the 3d of October, and, marching all night, arrived at three in the morning at German-town. The fortieth regiment, commanded R 3 manded by Colonel Mufgrave, who were first attacked, made so gallant a resistance that the whole army had time to form; and Major General Grey bringing up the left wing by a rapid and feafonable movement, the Americans were reduced to act on the defensive, and, after a conflict maintained for feveral hours in darkness and confufion, were compelled to retreat, but with fo little loss that they carried off with them their whole train of artillery. Though the disappointment of the enemy was great, the English commander had little reason to boast of his victory: the killed and wounded in this engagement confiderably exceeded the lofs at Brandywine, and it was perceived with fenfible chagrin that the Americans had become no mean proficients in the art of war.

A necessary work of very great importance and no small difficulty was now to be attempted in the attack of the works at Red-bank, and the opposite island, which commanded the passage of the Delawar, without the free navigation of which neither fleet nor army could winter at Philadelphia. On the 22d of October an effort was made, by a numerous body of Hessians commanded by Colonel Donop, to storm the fortress of Red-bank; but, after displaying much bravery, they were repulsed with prodigious slaughter. An unusually sterce attack was at the same time made by the shipping on the works of Fort Island, on which they made little impression; impression; and the Augusta man of war, and Merlin sloop, in avoiding the chevaux-de-frize, were stranded, and the Augusta by accident blown up. On the 15th of November the attack was renewed with a more formidable force; and the works being now nearly demolished, the garrison retired in the night across the river in boats to Red-bank, which was also soon afterwards evacuated, for reasons which do not sufficiently appear. The chevaux-de-frize were now weighed with great difficulty, and the free navigation of the river restored; but winter was by this time approaching, the season for action had elapsed, and no farther military or naval enterprises of moment were attempted during the short remainder of the campaign.

While such was the disappointment resulting from a succession of victories in the South, it will now be necessary to advert to the terrible consequences of deseat and disaster in the North. After the evacuation of Canada by the Americans, in the summer of 1776, incredible exertions were made on the part of the English to acquire a naval superiority on Lake Champlain, so necessary to the success of their suture projects. A fleet of above thirty vessels, all carrying cannon, was in about three months little less than created, though a few of the largest were re-constructions, having been first framed and sent over from Great Britain. The American sleet, though not inconsiderable, was by no means equal to cope with this great force. It is remarkable that the two fleets were commanded by land officers, General Carleton and General Arnold being equally ambitious to support on a new element the reputation they had acquired by their military skill and conduct.

Early on the 11th of October 1776, the British armament, proceeding up the Lake, discovered the enemy's fleet drawn up with great judgment, in a line extending from the island of Valicourt to the western main. A warm action ensued, in which the Americans, notwithstanding the extraordinary courage and intrepid efforts of their commander, were entirely defeated. General Arnold was under the necessity of setting fire to his own ship, the Congress galley, to prevent her falling into the hands of the English, not quitting her however till the was actually in flames; and with nice and dangerous attention to the point of honor keeping his flag flying to the last moment. Thus was Lake Champlain recovered, the enemy's force being nearly destroyed-a few small vessels only making their escape to Ticonderoga. Crown Point, on this disaftrous event, was immediately abandoned, and the American force concentrated at Ticonderoga; which being adjudged too strongly defended to be attacked with fuccess at this advanced season, General Carleton now put his troops into winter cantonments in Canada.

In all the complex and hazardous operations of the Canadian war, General Carleton had conducted himself with equal judgment, vigor, and success; and his generous and humane treatment of the prisoners which had fallen into his hands, formed a firiking contrast to the barbarity which pervaded the military prisons of New York. Of the Indians in his fervice General Carleton had made a very sparing use, and at the end of the campaign they were difmiffed on a general promife of returning when called for. But it was believed that he had, in his dispatches to England, strongly remonstrated against the employment of savages in any shape whatever in the farther profecution of this war. Whether on this or on other accounts offence was taken at his conduct, cannot certainly be known: but, to the furprise, and no doubt to the chagrin of the Governor, General Burgoyne, who had paffed the winter in England, arrived early in the fpring of 1777 in America, with a commission appointing him General of the Northern army beyond the limits of the province of Canada.

The plan of the intended expedition fouthward of the Lakes had been entirely concerted between the American Secretary and General Burgoyne, who, to use his own courtly language, "had thrown himself at his Majesty's FEET, to be employed in any way that he thought proper." In pursuance of this plan, General Burgoyne proceeded ceeded up Lake Champlain, and landed a little to the northward of Crown Point, where he met the Indians in Congress, and in compliance with their customs gave them a WAR FEAST; and in an harangue which he afterwards made to these savages, he endeavored to excite their ardor, and at the fame time to repress their barbarity—incompatibilities which no art or eloquence could hope to reconcile. This was followed (June 1777) by a manifesto, in which the General, in language approaching the oriental style of exaggeration and bombast, ftrove to inspire the Americans with terror, by a representation of the irrefistible force which he commanded, and to awe them into fubmiffion by menaces, which produced no other effect than, by exciting their utmost resentment and detestation, to rouse them more strongly into action *.

After a short stay at Crown Point, the army pro-

* Such was the fanguine and favage spirit which breathed throughout this famous proclamation, unparalleled except in ONE very recent instance, that the following lines from Shakespeare's Timon of Athens were not unhappily applied to it as a kind of comment or paraphrase:

Pity not honored age for his white beard.

Strike me the matron—Let not the virgin's cheek

Make foft thy trenchant fword—Spare not the babe

Whose dimpled smiles from fools exhaust their mercy:

Mince it without remorse.

ceeded under convoy of the shipping on the Lake to Ticonderoga, a post of uncommon natural firength, and rendered famous by the difastrous attack made upon it by General Abercrombie in the preceding war. Here the Americans appeared to be in great force, and they had bestowed infinite labor in repairing the old works and in adding new. fo that the fiege of this fortrefs was confidered as an enterprife of great hazard and difficulty; but, on the first approach of the English, it was suddenly and unaccountably evacuated by the garrison on the night of the 5th of July, by direction of the commander General St. Clair, leaving behind them their artillery, provisions, and stores. No sooner had the first dawn of the morning discovered the flight of the enemy, than preparations were made for a vigorous purfuit both by land and water. The main body of the Americans were quickly overtaken and entirely defeated by General Frazer; and their remaining naval force, which had rendezvoused at Skenesborough, was destroyed by General Burgoyne. The fugitive Americans retreated with the utmost precipitation to Fort Edward, on the North or Hudson's River, where General Schuyler, commander in chief of the American northern army, had fixed his head-quarters.

The British army, highly elated at the rapid series of successes which had hitherto attended them, now exerted indefatigable industry in clearing the Wood Creek, which is a continuation of Lake Champlain, from the obstacles which impeded the passage of the batteaux; and in conveying gunboats, provision-vessels, and batteaux, over land into Lake George. From Fort Anne, at the extremity of the Wood Creek, where the batteauxnavigation ends, to Fort Edward, a distance scarcely exceeding twenty miles, the difficulties attending the march of the army were inconceivably great. In this fhort space they had no less than forty bridges to conftruct, one of which was over a morafs two miles in extent, and the roads were every where obstructed by large timber trees laid across with their branches interwoven. The heavy train of artillery which accompanied the army was also found a great incumbrance, and it was not without infinite labor and perfeverance that on the 30th of July General Burgoyne fixed his head-quarters at Fort Edward-the Americans having now retired to Saratoga. The joy with which the fight of the North River, fo long the object of their hopes and wifhes, inspired the army, seemed to be confidered as an ample compensation for all their labors; and with unremitted ardor they now bent all their efforts to bring forward provisions and ftores from Fort George, at the extremity of the lake of that name, fufficient to form a magazine for the fubfiftence of the troops in their march through the wild and uncultivated country they had had yet to traverse. So ineffectual, however, were their utmost exertions, that on the 15th of August they had only four days provision in store; and the General understanding that a large magazine was collected at Bennington, twenty miles to the eastward of Hudson's River, for the use of the enemy, he detached Colonel Baum at the head of about five hundred men to furprise the place: at the fame time moving with the whole army up the eastern shore of Hudson's River, he encamped nearly opposite to Saratoga. The Colonel finding his destination discovered, and his force wholly insufficient to the purpose, took post at a small distance from Bennington, whence he communicated intelligence of his fituation to General Burgoyne, who dispatched Colonel Breyman with about an equal force to his affistance. The Provincial General, Starke, who commanded the militia of the district. determined however to lose no time in attacking the first party before any reinforcement should arrive; and the Provincials furrounding on every fide the fmall corps of Colonel Baum, forced their entrenchments, made themselves masters of their cannon, and after a brave refiftance, in which many were killed or wounded, the rest surrendered themfelves prisoners. 'Colonel Breyman, who had no fuspicion of this event, arrived nearly at the same fpot on the evening of the fame day, and was attacked with the fame resolution, and with much difficulty difficulty effected his retreat, with the loss of his artillery, and with ranks dreadfully diminished. This was a heavy and unlooked-for stroke. In the mean time Colonel St. Leger, who commanded a separate corps on the Mohawk River, and had in conjunction with Colonel Johnson, and a great body of Indians, who committed their accustomed horrid ravages, invested Fort Stanwix, was compelled by the Governor, Colonel Gansevort, to raise the siege, leaving behind him his artillery and stores.

At this period General Gates was appointed to fuperfede General Schuyler in the command of the northern army; and the spirits of the Provincials being much raifed by their late fuccesses and the long inaction of General Burgoyne, a formidable and increasing army was collected in the vicinity of Still Water, on the western bank of Hudson's River, fome miles to the fouthward of Saratoga. Notwithstanding the present unpromising prospect, General Burgoyne, having now about thirty days provision in store, resolved, without calling any council of war, to pass the river, which he effected about the middle of September, and encamped on the heights of Saratoga, the enemy not receding from their position at Still Water. In his public dispatches, the General offers the following very extraordinary reasons for this determination: "The peremptory tenor of his orders, and the feafon of the year, admitted no alternative. The expedition.

tion, fays he, which I commanded, was evidently meant at first to be bazarded—circumstances might require it should be devoted. A critical junction of Mr. Gates's force with Mr. Washington might possibly decide the fate of the war; the failure of my junction with Sir Henry Clinton, or the loss of my retreat to Canada, could be only a partial misfortune." Notwithstanding this ingenious apology, it is probable that the idea of devoting his own army, in order to save that of Sir William Howe, did not occur to General Burgoyne, till, by a feries of unlooked-for disasters, it was actually and irretrievably devoted; nor is there just ground for the affertion, that it was meant to be bazarded in any peculiar or unusual sense.

So fanguine in fact were the ideas of the Court of St. James's, that the poffibility of a failure was fearcely within the compass of their contemplation. As the army advanced along the western bank of the river, towards the enemy, they found the country very impracticable, being covered with thick woods, and intersected with creeks, which made a continual repair of bridges necessary. At length, on the 19th of September, they were attacked with unexpected vigor by the Americans: the action lasted from noon till sun-set, when the Royal army were lest in possession of the field. This was the sole advantage they could boast, nor could any difference be discerned in the behaviour of the Provincial militia and the veteran troops of Britain, on this hard and well-fought day. The Royal army lay all night on their arms in the field of battle, and in the morning they took a position in front of the enemy's camp, fortifying their right wing, and extending their left to the banks of the river. At this crisis, General Burgoyne received a letter in eigher from General Clinton, informing him of his defign to make a diverfion in his favor, by an expedition up the North River, which, though far short of the aid he had once expected, he in reply urged General Clinton to the immediate performance of; declaring his intention, in hope of favourable events, to remain in his present position till the 12th of October.

Early in the month, General Clinton, at the head of about 4000 troops, proceeded up the North River to Forts Montgomery and Constitution, which they reduced. They afterwards broke an immense boom and chain extending from shore to shore, and burnt several ships and armed vessels lying in the river; without any apparent provocation or necessity, also destroying many delightful and elegant mansions on its banks, with the whole of the beautiful village of Esopus. It was now unquestionably in their power to have proceeded without interruption to Albany; but the loss they had sustained in the midst of their successes.

ceffes, and the apprehension that their communication with New York would be in the end cut off, probably induced General Clinton to return, and the Northern army was left to its fate. A considerable provincial force had now formed in the rear of General Burgoyne, and, making themselves masters of the posts on Lake George, effectually obstructed any supplies of provision or stores from that quarter.

In the beginning of October, the English General thought it necessary to lessen the rations of the foldiers. On the 7th of that month, a detachment of 1500 men, conducted by the General in person, made a movement to the right, in order to discover if there were any possible means of forcing a passage. In the mean time the Americans, perceiving the lines weakened by this movement, fell with the utmost fury upon the left and centre of the British army, which, being totally overpowered by numbers, were compelled to retire within their lines: they had fcarcely entered them, when the Americans, purfuing with eagerness their success, flormed them in different parts with uncommon fierceness, under a heavy fire of artillery, grape fhot, and mufguetry. General Arnold, who commanded the attack, and performed prodigies of valor, being grievously wounded, was obliged to retire; and night at length put an end to the engagement, not however before the German en-Vor. IL. trenchments trenchments had been carried fword in hand, and a lodgement made which left every other quarter dangerously exposed. It was therefore judged absolutely necessary to take a new position; and, amidst the darkness and horrors of this fatal night, the whole army retreated in deep and silent sadness to the heights in the rear of their former encampment.

On the next day the General continued his retreat to Saratoga, where, on his arrival, he found the passes already occupied in force by the enemy. The farther shores of the river were also lined with numerous detachments of troops, which, with the affiftance of their batteaux, entirely commanded the navigation; and no hope now remained but in a rapid nocturnal march to Fort Edward, abandoning their artillery and baggage. But while preparations were making for this purpose, intelligence was received, that the enemy were strongly entrenched opposite the fords at Fort Edward, and that the high grounds between Fort Edward and Fort George were also every where fecured and fortified. The attempt was therefore confidered as hopeless and desperate; and three days fubfiftence only remaining in the camp, the dreadful necessity became apparent, of proposing to General Gates terms of capitulation. After a fhort negotiation, a Convention was concluded, by which it was agreed, that the British army fhould should march out of the camp with the honors of war, and then lay down their arms; and be allowed a free embarkation from Boston to Europe, upon condition of their not ferving again in America during the prefent war. Upon this ever memorable occasion, the generofity of the American Commander would not fuffer an individual to leave the camp to witness the degrading spectacle of piling the British arms. Such was the melancholy catastrophe of an army confifting, at its departure from Canada, of above 10,000 men, but now reduced by the fword, by famine, hardships, and disease, to little more than half the original number *. The whole plan of this campaign was, as might reasonably be supposed from its disastrous conclusion, most severely cenfured. A co-operation of the two principal armies under the Generals Howe and Burgoyne

^{*} The catastrophe of Saratoga will recall to the recollection of the classical reader, the fate of the Roman army under Aulus in the Jugurthine war, as described by the picturesque and majestic pencil of Sallust. "Milites ex hibernis in expeditionem Aulus evocat—hieme aspera pervenit ad oppidum Suthul. Jugurtha, cognitâ vanitate atque imperitiâ legati, ipse per saltuosa loca et tramites exercitum ductare—intempestiva nocte de improviso multitudine Numidarum Auli castra circumvenit. Milites Romani percusti tumultu insolito, arma capere alii, alii se abdere, trepidare, cœlum nocte atque nubibus obscuratum—periculum anceps. Dein Jugurtha postero die cum Aulo in colloquio verba facit, incolumis omnis sub jugum missurum, uti diebus decem Numidiâ decederet."

had been univerfally expected; and so firmly perfuaded was General Washington that a junction between them was in contemplation, that when the British army at New York had actually embarked on the expedition to the Chesapeak, the American General long persisted in his opinion that the fleet was destined to the northward.

On the 30th of July he wrote from Coriel's ferry, on the Delawar: "Howe's in a manner abandoning Burgoyne is fo unaccountable a matter, that till I am fully affured it is fo, I cannot help casting my eyes continually behind me." When the English fleet, after touching at the Capes of Delawar, again stood out to sea, General Washington still writes under the influence of the fame perfuafion: "It appears," fays he, "that General Howe has been practifing a deep feint to draw our whole force to this point. Countermarch your division, and proceed with all possible 'expedition to Peek's-kill." Again, August 3: "The conduct of the enemy is difficult and diftrefling to be understood;" and not till the latter end of the month was the doubt entirely removed. "The English fleet," says he (August 22), "have entered the Chefapeak; there is not now the least 'danger of Howe's going to New England." It does not however appear, that this co-operation was at any time in the contemplation of Sir William Howe; and the first intimation that any support whatever whatever would be expected from him in favor of the Northern expedition, was contained in a letter of Lord George Germaine, received by Sir William Howe when actually in the Bay of Chefapeak, in which he fays, "I trust that, whatever you meditate, it will be executed in time to co-operate with the army ordered to proceed from Canada." The American Minister, as well as the Governor of Canada, had been apprized of General Howe's intended march to the Delawar; and could Lord George Germaine possibly imagine, that the purposes of the Southern expedition could be answered, and General Howe be able to return in proper time to co-operate with General Burgoyne in the Northern? The truth is, that no traces are difcernible of any regular plan for the conduct of the campaign, or of any grand or masterly co-operation of means for the attainment of any precise or determinate object. Vague and general hopes were entertained, that the army under General Burgoyne, with fuch aid as he might eventually derive from the central force at New York, would fuffice for the fubiugation of the Northern provinces, and that General Howe would in the mean time accomplish the conquest of the Southern. Such were the flattering delufions which, at the distance of 3000 miles, passed at the Court of St. James's for fober and rational expectancies; and in the annals of history, Minden S 3 den and Saratoga will ever remain incontrovertible proofs, that Lord George Germaine was as great in the cabinet, as Lord George Sackville had been in the field.

On the 20th of November 1777, the Parliament affembled. Previous to this period, the exultation of the Court, on the intelligence of the first successes of General Burgoyne, had suffered a fudden and grievous check by the last dispatches of that Commander, written after the defeat of the detachments of Baum and Breyman, when the tide of fortune was evidently fetting strong against him. The Royal Speech, however, discovered no fymptoms of dejection; no relentings, no forebodings. His Majesty expressed his "considence, that the spirit and intrepidity of his forces would be attended with important fuccess; but intimated the necessity of preparing for fuch farther operations as the contingencies of the war and the ob-STINACY OF THE REBELS might render expedient. He expressed his determination steadily to purfue the measures in which they were engaged, and his hope that the 'DELUDED AND UNHAPPY MULTITUDE would finally return to their allegiance."-In the House of Commons, the Address, which was moved by Lord Hyde, was opposed by the Marquis of Granby, who brought forward an amendment, in fubstance recommending to his Majesty measures of accommodation, and an immediate mediate ceffation of hostilities, as necessary for effectuating so desirable a purpose. This, after a long and vehement discussion, was rejected by a majority of 243 to 86. But the debate in the Upper House was rendered peculiarly interesting by the prefence of Lord Chatham, who himfelf moved an amendment of fimilar import to that of Lord Granby, which he supported with all that energy and eloquence which had formerly produced fuch mighty effects, and which must now have roused the nation from its death-like torpor, had this been within the compass of human virtue or human ability. He faid, "It had been usual on fimilar occasions of public difficulty and diffrefs, for the Crown to make application to that House, the great hereditary Council of the Nation, for advice and affiftance. As it is the right of Parliament to give, fo it is the duty of the Crown to ask it. But, on this day, and in this extreme momentous exigency, no reliance is reposed on your Councils, no advice is asked of Parliament; but the Crown, from itself, and by itself, declares an unalterable determination to pursue its own preconcerted measures; -and what measures, my Lords? Meafures which have produced hitherto nothing but disappointments and defeats. I CANNOT, my Lords, I will NOT join in congratulation on misfortune and difgrace. This, my Lords, is a perilous and tremendous moment; it is not a time

time for adulation; the fmoothness of flattery cannot fave us in this rugged and awful crifis. It is now necessary to instruct the Throne in the language of TRUTH. We must, if possible, difpel the delusion and darkness which invelop it; and display in its full danger, and genuine colors, the ruin which is brought to our doors. Can Ministers still presume to expect support in their infatuation? Can Parliament be fo dead to its dignity and duty as to give their support to measures thus obtruded and forced upon them? meafures, my Lords, which have reduced this late flourishing empire to scorn and contempt! 'But yesterday, and England might have stood against the World; Now, none fo poor to do her reverence.' The people whom we at first despised as rebels, but whom we now acknowledge as enemies, are abetted against you, supplied with every military store, their interests consulted, and their Ambassadors entertained by your inveterate enemy-and our Ministers do not, and dare not interpose with dignity or effect. The desperate state of our army abroad is in part known. No man more highly esteems and honors the English troops than I do: I know their virtues and their valor; I know they can achieve any thing except impoffibilities; and I know that the conquest of English America is an impossibility. You CAN-NOT, my Lords, you CANNOT conquer America. What

What is your present situation there? We do not know the worft: but we know that in three campaigns we have done nothing, and fuffered much. You may swell every expence, and strain every effort, accumulate every affiftance, and extend your traffic to the shambles of every German defpot, your attempts will be for ever vain and impotent-doubly fo, indeed, from this mercenary aid, on which you rely; for it irritates to an incurable refentment the minds of your adversaries to overrun them with the mercenary fons of rapine and plunder, devoting them and their possessions to the rapacity of hireling cruelty. If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I never would lay down my arms-never, never, never! But, my Lords, who is the man that, in addition to the difgraces and mischiefs of the war, has dared to authorize and affociate to our arms the tomabawk and scalping-knife of the savage?-to call into civilized alliance the wild and inhuman habitant of the woods?—to delegate to the merciles. Indian the defence of disputed rights, and to wage the horrors of his barbarous war against our brethren? My Lords, these enormities cry aloud for redrefs and punishment. Familiarized to the horrid scenes of savage cruelty, our army can. no longer boaft of the noble and generous principles which dignify a foldier. No longer are their their feelings awake to the 'pride, pomp, and circumstance of GLORIOUS war;'-but the sense of honor is degraded into a vile spirit of plunder, and the systematic practice of murder. From the antient connection between Great Britain and her Colonies, both parties derived the most important advantage. While the shield of our protection was extended over America, fhe was the fountain of our wealth, the nerve of our strength, the basis of our power. It is not, my Lords, a wild and lawless banditti whom we oppose: the resistance of America is the ftruggle of free and virtuous patriots. Let us then feize with eagerness the present moment of reconciliation. America has not yet finally given herfelf up to France: there yet remains a possibility of escape from the fatal effect of our delufions. In this complicated crifis of danger, weakness, and calamity, terrified and infulted by the neighbouring powers, unable to act in America, or acting only to be destroyed, WHERE is the man who will venture to flatter us with the hope of fuccess from perseverance in measures productive of these dire effects? Who has the effrontery to attempt it? Where is that man? Let him, if he DARE, stand forward and shew his face. You cannot conciliate America by your present mcasures; you cannot fubdue her by your present or any measures. What then can you do?—You cannot conquer, you cannot gain; but you can ADDRESS-you can full the fears and anxieties of the moment into ignorance of the danger that should produce them. I did hope, instead of that false and empty pride engendering high conceits and prefumptuous imaginations, that Ministers would have humbled themselves in their errors—would have confessed and retracted them, and, by an active, though a late repentance, have endeavoured to redeem them. But, my Lords, fince they have neither fagacity to forefee, nor justice nor humanity to shun those calamities; fince not even bitter experience can make them feel, nor the imminent ruin of their country awaken them from their stupefaction. the guardian care of Parliament must interpose. shall therefore, my Lords, propose to you an amendment to the address to his Majesty-To recommend an immediate ceffation of hostilities, and the commencement of a treaty to restore peace and liberty to America, strength and happiness to England, fecurity and permanent prosperity to both coun-This, my Lords, is yet in our power, and let not the wifdom and justice of your Lordships neglect the happy and perhaps the only opportunity."

Lord Suffolk, Secretary of State, in the course of the debate, contended for the employment of Indians in the war—" Besides its policy and necessity," his Lordship said "that the measure was also allowable on principle, for that it was perfectly justifiable to use all the means that God and Nature had put into our hands."

This moving the indignation of Lord Chatham, he fuddenly rose, and gave full vent to his feelings, in one of the most extraordinary bursts of eloquence that the pen of history has recorded: "I am aftonished," exclaimed his Lordship, "SHOCKED to hear fuch principles confessed; to hear them avowed in this House, or even in this country. My Lords. I did not intend to have encroached again on your attention, but I cannot repress my indignation-I feel myself impelled to speak. My Lords, we are called upon as Members of this House, as Men, as Christians, to protest against such horrible barbarity .- That God and Nature put into our hands! What ideas of Gop and Nature that Noble Lord may entertain I know not-but I know that fuch detestable principles are equally abhorrent to religion and humanity. What! to attribute the facred fanction of God and Nature to the maffacres of the Indian scalping-knife!-to the cannibalfavage torturing, murdering, devouring, drinking the blood of his mangled victims! . Such notions thock every precept of morality, every feeling of humanity, every fentiment of honor. abominable principles, and this more abominable avowal of them, demand the most decisive indignation. I call upon that right reverend and this most most learned Bench to vindicate the religion of their God, to support the justice of their country, I call upon the Bishops, to interpose the unfullied fanctity of their lawn-upon the Judges, to interpose the purity of their ermine to save us from this pollution. I call upon the honor of your Lordships, to reverence the dignity of your ancestors, and to maintain your own. I call upon the spirit and humanity of my country, to vindicate the national character. I invoke the GENIUS of the CONSTITUTION. From the tapestry that:adorns these walls the immortal ancestor of this noble Lord frowns with indignation at the difgrace of his country. In vain did he defend the liberty and establish the religion of Britain against the tyranny of Rome, if these worse than popish cruelties and inquifitorial practices are endured among us. To fend forth the merciless cannibal thirsting for blood! -against whom ?-Your Protestant brethren !to lay waste their country, to desolate their dwellings, and extirpate their race and name by the aid and inftrumentality of these horrible HELL-HOUNDS of war! Spain can no longer boast pre-eminence in barbarity. She armed herfelf with blood-hounds to extirpate the wretched natives of Mexico; but we, more ruthless, loose these Dogs of WAR against our countrymen in America, endeared to us by every tie that should fanctify humanity. My Lords, I folemnly call upon your Loruships, and upon every every order of men in the State, to stamp upon this infamous procedure the indelible stigma of the public abhorence. More particularly I call upon the holy Prelates of our religion to do away this iniquity; let them perform a lustration to purify their country from this deep and deadly sin. My Lords, I am old and weak, and at present unable to say more, but my feelings and indignation were too strong to have said less. I could not have slept this night in my bed, nor reposed my head upon my pillow, without giving this vent to my eternal abhorrence of such enormous and preposterous principles."

Although Lord Chatham on this occasion feemed, like some "great master of the powerful spell," to have uttered "those thrilling accents that awake the dead," the event, as on former occasions, proved that no impression could be made on the temper and disposition of the House, more cold and callous than alpine snows or monumental marble; for, on the division, 28 Lords only voted in support of the motion, against 97 who opposed it.

On the 2d of December (1777) Mr. Fox moved for an enquiry into the State of the Nation, in which the Minister professed his cordial acquiescence. Amongst other papers which were thought necessary to elucidate the subsequent investigation, Mr. Fox moved for returns of such colonies or places as had in pursuance of the powers vested in the Commissioners Commissioners been declared at the King's peace, or copies of such papers as had relation thereto. This motion the Minister vehemently opposed, and declared he neither could nor would consent to make discoveries inconsistent with sound wisdom and policy, and prejudicial to the real interests of the country.

During the heat of the debate intelligence was brought, that, in consequence of a motion of the Duke of Graston, these very papers had been actually laid upon the table of the other House; but the Minister, as if to try how far the obsequiousness of the House would extend, still persisted in his refusal, and maintained "that the House of Commons were not to be guided in their determinations by any extrinsic consideration;" and on a division, incredible as it may seem, the motion was actually negatived by a majority of 178 to 89. An act by which the dignity of the House was more wantonly facrificed by ministerial caprice and insolence, it would be most assured.

The fucceeding day was rendered for ever memorable by the disclosure of the melancholy catafirophe at Saratoga. The American Secretary being called upon to declare the purport of the dispatches recently received from Canada, with shame and reluctance communicated the intelligence of that fatal event. This was followed by a long and profound filence.

filence, and one general fentiment of amazement and consternation seemed to pervade the House. At length a torrent of invective, accompanied by taunts the most bitter and farcastic, were poured out by the leaders of the Opposition against the Ministers, whose pride, ignorance, and incapacity had occasioned a more fignal disgrace and calamity than had ever before in the most disastrous war befallen the British arms. The time did not ferve for bold and lofty language on the part of Ministers. Lord North, with much apparent dejection, and even tears—the "iron tears" of difappointed pride and fallen ambition-acknowledged "that he had indeed been unfortunate, but that his intentions were ever just and upright; that he had originally been in a manner forced into an office which he would most willingly and gladly refign, could his refignation facilitate the obtaining that peace and reconciliation for which he had ever earnestly wished." The American Minister also professed, in terms of humiliation, "that he should be ever ready to submit his conduct to the judgment of that House; hoping, nevertheless, that the House would suspend their censures relative to the late unhappy event, till an impartial investigation both of the plan and the execution of it had taken place."

On the 5th of December (1777) Lord Chatham, in consequence of the late intelligence from America, attended the House of Peers, and moved, "that an address be presented to his Majesty, to cause the proper officers to lay before the House copies of all orders and instructions to General Burgoyne relative to the late expedition from Ca-Holding up a paper in view of the House, his Lordship faid, "that he had the King's speech in his hand, and a deep fense of the public calamity in his heart. That fpeech, he faid, contained a most unfaithful picture of the state of publie affairs; it had a specious outside, was full of hopes, while every thing within was full of danger. A fystem destructive of all faith and confidence had been introduced, his Lordship affirmed, within the last fifteen years at St. James's, by which pliable men, not capable men, had been raifed to the highest posts of Government. A few obscure perfons had obtained an afcendency where no man fhould have a personal ascendency, and by the most insidious means the nation had been betrayed into a war of which they now reaped the bitter fruits. The SPIRIT of DELUSION, his Lordship faid, had gone forth; Ministers had imposed on the people; Parliament had been induced to fanctify the imposition; a visionary phantom of revenue had been conjured up for the basest of purposes, but it was now for ever vanished. His Lordfhip faid, that the abilities of General Burgoyne were confessed, his personal bravery not surpassed, Vol. II.

his zeal in the fervice unquestionable. He had experienced no peftilence, nor fuffered any of the accidents which fometimes superfede the wifest and most spirited exertions of human industry. What then is the cause of his misfortune?-Want of wisdom in our councils, want of ability in our Minifters. His Lordship said, the plan of penetrating into the Colonies from Canada was a most wild, uncombined, and mad project; and the mode of carrying on the war was the most bloody. barbarous, and ferocious recorded in the annals of history. The arms of Britain had been fullied and tarnifhed by blending the fealping-knife and tomahawk with the fword and firelock. Such a mode of warfare was a contamination which all the waters of the Hudson and the Delawar would never wash It was impossible for America to forget or forgive fo horrid an injury."

In the course of his speech he animadverted in the severest terms on the language recently held by a most reverend prelate, the Archbishop of York, both in print and in that House. "The pernicious doctrines advanced by that prelate were, he said, the doctrines of Atterbury and Sacheverel. As a Whis he abjured and detested them; and he hoped he should yet see the day when they would be deemed libellous, and treated as such." The motion being negatived, his Lordship next moved an address to the King, "that all orders and treaties relative to the employment of the Indian favages be laid before the House."

Lord Gower rofe, and, with all that acrimony by which his speeches were usually distinguished, opposed and reprobated the motion, afferting, "that the noble Lord had himfelf employed favages without scruple in the operations of the last war." This charge Lord Chatham positively and peremptorily denied, and challenged the Ministers, if any such instructions of his were to be found, to produce them. If at all employed, they had erept into the fervice from the occasional utility of their affiftance in unexplored parts of the country. He faid; "the late King George II. had too much regard for the military dignity of his people, and also too much HUMANITY, to agree to fuch a propofal had it been made to him, and he called upon Lord Amherst to declare the truth." Lord Amherst, not able to evade this appeal, reluctantly owned that Indians had been employed on both fidesthe French employed them first, he said, and we followed their example; but that he had been authorized to take them into his Majesty's service by inftructions from the Minister, his Lordship would not affirm. The motion was difmiffed by the previous question.

The two Houses in a few days after this determined upon an adjournment to the 20th of January 1778, notwithstanding an animated resistance on the part of the Opposition, who demonstrated the impolicy at so critical a juncture of indulging in fo long a recess. Lord Chatham on this occasion declared, "that it was with grief and aftonishment he heard a proposal made of a nature fo extraordinary at a crifis fo urgent; when," faid he, "my Lords, I will be bold to fay, events of a most alarming tendency, little expected or forefeen, will shortly happen. Ministers flatter themfelves, whenever the worst comes, that they shall be able to shelter themselves behind the authority of Parliament; but this, my Lords, cannot be. They ftand COMMITTED, and they must ABIDE the ISSUE. The DAY of RETRIBUTION is at hand, when the VENGEANCE of a much injured people will, I truft, FALL HEAVILY on the AUTHORS of their RUIN"

During the recess, the spirits of the Ministry, which had sunk to so low an ebb, seemed to revive; and the powerful faction of the Tories, which had of late years acquired such an ascendency under the patronage of the Court, being if possible more than ever eager for the subjugation of America, large offers were made from different places for raising new regiments to supply the late heavy loss; and a determination was taken to prosecute the war with redoubled force and vigor.

On an early day after the recess, the House of Commons, in consequence of a motion previously made.

made by Mr. Fox, refolved itself into a Committee on the state of the nation; and, in a most able and comprehensive speech, Mr. Fox entered at great length into a retrospective view of the whole conduct of the present Administration respecting America, including as well the measures which led to the war, as the manner in which it had been profecuted. He laid it down as an incontrovertible axiom, "that it was impossible for any country to fall within fo few years from the high pitch of power and glory which we had done, without fome radical error in its Government. The present calamitous state of the nation was evidently to be traced to the blind obstinacy and wretched incapacity of its Ministers, who would not listen to any overtures of conciliation, who could not carry into effect any plan of coercion. He made it appear from the papers before them, that at a time when we were in immediate danger of encountering the whole force of the House of Bourbon, united with that of America, the army in England and Ireland had been fo reduced and weakened by the continual drain of the war, as to fall feveral thousand men short of the usual peace establishment. To abandon the ministerial plan of conquest was therefore a matter not of choice but necessity, when the force employed in America was fo much diminished in consequence of the late difastrous events, and when it was incapable of being reinforced without leaving this country abfolutely without defence. Upon this ground Mr.

Fox moved as a refolution of the Committee, "that an address should be presented to his Majesty, befeeching his Majesty that no part of the national force in these kingdoms, or in the garrisons of Gibraltar or Minorca, should be sent to America." To the infinite surprise of the public, no debate ensued, nor was any reply whatever made to this speech; but the question being called for, the motion was rejected on a division by a majority of 259 to 165, the largest minority that had yet appeared in this Parliament in opposition to the Ministry.

In a few days after this Mr. Burke moved for the papers relative to the employment of the Indians, and in a speech distinguished by that characteristic glow and warmth of coloring, which in this instance did as much credit to the judgment as the imagination of the speaker, he reprobated the measure as replete with disgrace and insamy. "The Indian mode of making war, he said, was so horrible as not only to shock the manners of all civilized nations, but far to exceed the serocity of any other barbarians recorded in antient or modern history. Their chief glory consisted in the number of human scalps which they acquired, and their chief delight was in the practice of torturing, mangling, roasting, and devouring their captives.

The attempt to prevent these enormities was wholly unavailing. Those Indians employed both by General Burgoyne and Colonel St. Leger had indiscriminately murdered men, women, and children—friends and foes—armed or unarmed, without distinction. The horrid murder of Miss Macrae on the morning of her intended marriage with an officer of the King's troops, and the massacre in cold blood of the prisoners taken in an engagement near Fort Stanwix, were particularly instanced as proofs of the absolute impracticability of restraining the barbarities of these savages." After a long debate Mr. Burke's motion was negatived by a majority of 223 to 137.

Various other motions made by Mr. Fox, Colonel Barré, and Mr. Burke, in the Committee of Enquiry, being also rejected, the Minister gave notice that he had digested a plan of conciliation, which he meant shortly to lay before the House. Accordingly, on the 17th of February 1778, Lord North moved for leave to bring in—"1. A Bill for removing all doubts and apprehensions concerning taxation by the Parliament of Great Britain in any of the Colonies and Plantations in North America; and 2. A Bill to enable his Majesty to appoint Commissioners, with sufficient powers to treat, consult, and agree upon the means of quieting the disorders now substitting in certain of the Colonies in America."

His Lordship in opening his plan acknowledged, "that he had always known that American taxation could never produce a beneficial revenue-that it was not his policy to tax them, but that he had found them taxed when he unfortunately came into Administration-and that he could not possibly suspect the regulation he had introduced in relation to the tea-duty, could have been productive of fuch fatal confequences. With respect to the coercive acts, his Lordship said, they had appeared necessary to remedy the distempers of the time; he complained, that the events of the war had turned out very different from what he had a right to expect from the great and well-appointed force fent over, but to events and not expectations he must make his plan conform. His Lordship faid, that the appointment of five Commissioners was in contemplation, who should be enabled to treat with the Congress as if it were a legal body; or with any individuals in their present civil capacities, or military commands; -that they should have a power to order a suspension of arms, to sufpend the operation of all laws, and to grant all forts of pardons. A preliminary renunciation of independency would not be required of America, and a contribution in any shape from America was not to be infifted upon as a fine qua non of the treaty. These concessions his Lordship declared to be founded on reason and propriety; and if the question tion was asked, why they had not been sooner proposed, he should reply, that the moment of victory, for which he had anxiously waited, seemed to him the only proper season for offering terms of concession. But though the result of the war had proved unfavorable, he would no longer delay the desirable and necessary work of reconciliation."

Never, perhaps, was the inexpressible absurdity of the ministerial system more apparent than at the prefent moment. The powers now granted were precifely of the nature of those with which it was the object of the motion made by the Duke of Grafton, in the fpring of 1776, to invest the former Commissioners, Lord and General Howe. Had that motion been adopted, the contest might unquestionably have been, with the utmost facility, amicably and honorably terminated; but the general aspect of affairs since that period was totally changed. From the declaration of independency which America had once made, she could never be expected to recede. The ftrength of Great Britain had been tried, and found unequal to the contest. The measures adopted by the English Government, particularly in the employment of German mercenaries and Indian favages, had inflamed the refentment of America to the highest pitch. recent fuccesses had rendered it to the last degree improbable that she would ever again consent to recognise, recognife, in any shape, or under any modification, the authority of Britain. A treaty of peace, commerce, and alliance was all that a just and sound policy, in the present circumstances, could hope, or would endeavor to accomplish.

The propositions of the Minister were received by the House without any symptoms of applause: on the contrary, they were assailed by objections from all quarters. The high-prerogative party lamented the degradation which the Bills would bring upon the Government of this country. They insisted that our resources were great and inexhaustible; and they bitterly deplored that pusillanimity in our councils, which, after so great an expense of blood and treasure, could submit, not only to give up all the objects of the contest, but to enter into a public treaty with armed rebels, which, after all, would not produce the end proposed.

The Opposition, usually so called, expressed their reluctant agreement in the probable truth of this prediction. The chances, in point of calculation, were infinitely against the success of the measure; but still there was a chance—and they would not, in any manner, impede or delay the execution of a plan which had conciliation for its object. They were not, however, the less severe upon the desence set up by the Minister.

Mr. Fox afferted, "that his Lordship had attempted a justification of the most unjustifiable measures measures which had ever disgraced any Government or ruined any Country. But his arguments might be collected into one point, his excuses comprifed in one apology—in one fingle word—IGNO-RANCE: a palpable and total ignorance of every part of the fubject. He hoped, and he was difappointed-he expected a great deal, and found little to answer his expectations—he thought America would have fubmitted to his laws, and they had refifted them-he thought they would have fubmitted to his armies, and they had defeated them-he made conciliatory propositions, and he thought they would fucceed, but they were rejected-he appointed Commissioners to make peace, and he thought they had powers; but he found they could not make peace, and that they had not fufficient powers. Had the prefent conceffions been offered in time, Mr. Fox faid, they would undoubtedly have been fuccessful: for, however obscure his former propositions of conciliation might be deemed, NECESSITY had at length compelled the noble Lord to fpeak plain. But what censure would be found sufficient, he asked, on those Ministers who had adjourned Parliament, in order to make a proposition of conciliation, and then neglected to do it until France had concluded a treaty with the United and Independent States of America, and acknowledged them as fuch? He did not speak from surmise, he faid, he had it from authority he could not question, question, that the treaty he mentioned had been figned in Paris ten days before; he therefore wished that the noble Lord would give the House satisfaction on that interesting point." The Minister, being closely pressed, at length reluctantly acknowledged, "that it was but too probable such a treaty was in agitation, though he had no authority to pronounce absolutely that it was concluded:" and it was animadverted upon as a very extraordinary circumstance, that the intelligence of a private Member of that House should be sooner received, and more authentically ascertained, than that of the Government. The Conciliatory Bills were carried through both Houses early in March.

On the fecond reading of the Bills in the House of Peers, the Duke of Grafton informed their Lordships, that he had, what he conceived to be, indubitable intelligence, that a Treaty had been actually figned between France and America: and his Grace demanded from the Ministers a public avowal or difavowal of this important fact. which Lord Weymouth, Secretary of State, replied, "that he knew nothing of any fuch treaty, nor had received any authentic information of its being either in existence or contemplation." Nevertheless, within a very few days after this extraordinary declaration, Lord North delivered a Royal message to the House of Commons, and Lord Weymouth to the House of Peers, in which the King informed the two Houses, "that a Rescript had. had been delivered by the Ambassador of his Most Christian Majesty, containing a direct avowal of a Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Alliance, recently concluded with America; in consequence of which offensive communication on the part of the Court of France, his Majesty had sent orders to his Ambassador to withdraw from that Court: and, relying on the zealous support of his people, he is prepared to exert all the force and resources of his kingdoms, to repel fo unprovoked and unjust an aggression." Addresses were voted by both Houses, containing the strongest affurances of affistance and support. An amendment moved by Mr. Baker, containing a fevere reflection on the conduct of the Minister, was previously rejected in the House of Commons by 263 voices against 113.

A fimilar amendment was moved in the Upper House by the Duke of Manchester, which gave rise to a debate, chiefly interesting, as it brought into full view a very important difference of opinion subsisting between the Lords in opposition, and which had on various occasions more covertly appeared, respecting the recognition of American Independence. The Marquis of Rockingham, and the whole Rockingham connection, maintained without reserve the necessity of admitting the Independence of America. "To attempt impossibilities," said they, "can only render our ruin inevitable; it is not now in our power to recover what we have wantonly thrown away." On the other hand, the Earls of Chatham, Temple, and Shelburne, and feveral other Lords, who had unhappily established a distinct connection, and were, throughout the long course of opposition to the present Ministry, considered as a separate party, disclaimed every idea of relinquishing America, and deprecated its independence as the greatest of all political and national evils; and as including the utter degradation and final ruin of this country. The numbers on the division were, 100 Lords who voted against the amendment, to 36 who supported it.

On the 7th of April, the Duke of Richmond, at the close of the Grand Committee of Enquiry, in which the Upper House as well as that of the Commons had been during the greater part of the fession deeply engaged, moved an Address to the King on the State of the Nation. In his fpeech in support of this Address, his Grace declared in ftrong terms his conviction of the necesfity of an immediate recognition of American In-"The mischief, he said, whatever dependence. might be the magnitude of it, was already done: America was already loft; her independence was as firmly established as that of other States. We had fufficient cause for regret, but our lamentation on the fubject was of no more avail than it would would be for the loss of Normandy or France." The Earl of Chatham, in full expectation that this point would come under discussion this day, refolved, however enfeebled and afflicted by his corporeal infirmities, to make his personal appearance in the House, in order to bear his decided testimony against it. The mind feels interested in the minutest circumstances relating to the last day of the public life of this renowned Statesman and Patriot. He was dressed in a rich fuit of black velvet, with a full wig, and covered up to the knees in flannel. On his arrival in the House, he refreshed himself in the Lord Chancellor's room, where he flaid till prayers were over, and till he was informed that bufiness was going to begin. He was then led into the House by his fon and fon-in-law Mr. William Pitt and Lord Viscount Mahon, all the Lords standing up out of respect, and making a lane for him to pass to the Earls' bench, he bowing very gracefully to them as he proceeded. He looked pale and much emaciated, but his eye retained all its native fire; which, joined to his general deportment, and the attention of the House, formed a spectacle very striking and impressive.

When the Duke of Richmond had fat down, Lord Chatham rose, and began by lamenting, "that his bodily infirmities had so long and at so important a crisis prevented his attendance on the duties of Parliament. He declared, that he had made an effort almost beyond the powers of his constitution, to come down to the House on this day, perhaps the LAST time be should ever be able to enter its walls, to express the indignation he felt at the idea which he understood was gone forth of yielding up the fovereignty of America. My Lords," continued he, "I rejoice that the grave has not closed upon me, that I am still alive to lift up my voice against the difmemberment of this antient and noble monarchy. Preffed down as I am by the load of infirmity, I am little able to affift my country in this most perilous conjuncture: but, my Lords, while I have fense and memory, I never will confent to tarnish the lustre of this nation by an ignominious furrender of its rights and fairest possessions. Shall a people so lately the terror of the world, now fall proftrate before the House of Bourbon? It is impossible. I am not. I confess, well informed of the resources of this kingdom, but I trust it has still sufficient to maintain its just rights, though I know them not .-Any state, my Lords, is better than despair. Let us at least make one effort—and, if we must fall, let us fall like men."

The Duke of Richmond, in reply, declared himfelf to be "totally ignorant of the means by which we were to refift with fuccess the combination of America with the House of Bourbon. He urged " the Noble Lord to point out any possible mode, if he were able to do it, of making the Americans renounce that independence of which they were in possession. His Grace added, that if HE could not, no man could, and that it was not in his power to change his opinion on the Noble Lord's authority, unsupported by any reasons, but a recital of the calamities arising from a state of things not in the power of this country now to alter."

Lord Chatham, who had appeared greatly moved during the reply, made an eager effort to rife at the conclusion of it, as if laboring with fome great idea, and impatient to give full fcope to his feelings; but, before he could utter a word. preffing his hand on his bosom, he fell down suddenly in a convulfive fit. The Duke of Cumberland, Lord Temple, and other Lords near him caught him in their arms. The House was immediately cleared; and his Lordship being carried into an adjoining apartment, the debate was adjourned. Medical affiftance being obtained, his Lordship in fome degree recovered, and was conveyed to his favorite villa of Hayes in Kent, where, after lingering fome few weeks, he expired May 11th, 1778, in the 70th year of his age.

On the first intelligence of his death, Colonel Barré repaired to the House of Commons, then sitting, and communicated the melancholy in-Vol. II. U formation. formation. Although it was an event which had been for fome time daily expected, the House feemed affected with the deepest sensibility, and forrow was apparent in every countenance. The recollection of his former pre-eminence in power, of his unrivalled eloquence, of his unwearied exertions in the public fervice, and of the unexampled prosperity to which Great Britain had attained under his administration, rushed upon the mind with irrefiftible force, and produced an emotion which the fympathy fo powerful in popular affemblies heightened to enthusiasm. The motion made by Colonel Barré, "that the remains of the Earl of Chatham be interred at the public expense," was unanimously adopted; with the farther addition, "that a monument be erected to his memory in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter, Westminster." This was followed by a motion from Lord John Cavendish, for an Address to the King, "that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to make a permanent provision for the family of the late WILLIAM PITT, Earl of CHATHAM, in confideration of the fervices performed by that able Statefinan;" and in the fequel, a Bill was brought into Parliament, and unanimoufly paffed, by which a clear annuity of 4000l. per annum, payable out of the Civil Lift, is for ever to be annexed to the Earldom of Chatham, and the fum of 20,000l. voted for the discharge of debts and incumbrances. Thus nobly nobly and gratefully did the nation reward the fervices of the man, whose counsels, to the amazement of the world, the had for fo many years neglected and contemned. The ready concurrence of the Court in the honors lavished on the memory of this great Statesman, may be ascribed entirely to the decided manner in which he delivered, almost in his last breath, his fentiments against the recognition of American Independence, and which may be regarded as the fole political error, with which, in respect to America, he is chargeable. What his precise ideas were, with regard to the plan of conciliation proper to be adopted in the actual circumstances of the nation, cannot be ascertained; but of this we may rest affured, from the uniform and fystematic tenor of his policy, that he never would have employed coercive means in accomplishing When he found, and had he been restored to the plenitude of power he certainly would have found, America determined to maintain her Independency, he must doubtless have discovered, and could not but have submitted to, the necessity of recognizing it. It is exceedingly to be lamented, that perfonal and party confiderations prevented that firm and cordial coalescence amongst the Whigs in opposition to the Court, which was for necessary to give efficacy to their exertions. The diflike of Lord Chatham to the Newcastle or Rockingham party was invincible; and the divi-II 2

fions and animofities which originated in that diflike, and which his death was far from extinguishing, have at length terminated in what may be con-Lidered as the almost total ruin of the Whig interest, and the final and complete triumph of the Tories; at least till the calamities, which have never yet failed to refult from a Tory system of government in this country, shall again awaken the dormant fpirit of Whiggifin in the nation, and confign the abfurd, pernicious, and detestable maxims of Tory government to public contempt and execration. But when a just allowance is made, and just allowance must be made for those imperfections from which no human character is exempt, Lord Chatham will unquestionably rank as one of the greatest, most enlightened, and beneficent Statesinen that ever adorned the annals of any age or country.

The diffress in which the kingdom of Ireland was involved in consequence of the war, and the general and loud complaints of the bulk of its inhabitants, made it absolutely necessary to attempt something farther for its relief; and in a Committee of the whole House, it was resolved,

I. That the Irish might be permitted to export directly to the British plantations or settlements, all goods, wares, and merchandize, being the produce of that kingdom, or of Great Britain, wool and woollen manufactures only excepted; as also foreign certificate goods legally imported.

II. That

II. That a direct importation be allowed of all goods, wares, and merchandize, being the produce of the British plantations, tobacco only excepted.

III. That the direct exportation of glass, manufactured in Ireland, be permitted to all places except Great Britain.

IV. That the importation of cotton yarn, the manufacture of Ireland, be allowed, duty free, into Great Britain; as also,

V. The importation of fail-cloth and cordage.

These resolutions excited a very great and general alarm amongst the commercial part of the British nation, who seemed to consider the admission of Ireland to any participation in trade, as equally destructive to their property, and subversive of their rights.

After the recess, very many instructions and petitions were presented to the House in opposition to them: and it deserves mention, as a striking instance of commercial folly and prejudice, that, in several of the petitions, the importation of Irish fail-cloth, and of wrought iron, are particularly specified as ruinous to the same manufactures in England; though it was by this time discovered, that, by a positive law of long standing, Ireland was in actual possession of those very privileges, although the Irish were so far from being able to prosecute these manufactures to any purpose of competition with the British, that great quantities of both were annually exported to that country from England. An almost equally great and equally groundless alarm had been taken at the Bill passed a few years since, for the free importation of woollen yarn into England; which was by experience found and acknowledged to be not merely innocuous, but beneficial; yet such insluence had the apprehensions of the public upon the disposition of the House, that the Bills sounded on the resolutions actually passed were ultimately dismissed, and some trivial points only conceded, not meriting a distinct specification.

Late in the fession, Sir George Saville moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the repeal of certain penalties imposed by an act passed in the 10th of King WILLIAM, entitled An Act for preventing the farther Growth of Popery; which penalties the mover stated to be, the punishment of Popish Priests, or Jesuits, as guilty of sclony, who fhould be found to officiate in the fervices of their church; the forfeiture of estate to the next Protestant heir, in case of the education of the Romish possession possession possession possession abroad; the power given to the fon, or other nearest relation, being a Protestant, to take possession of the father's estate during the lifetime of the proprietor; and the depriving Papifts of the power of acquiring any legal property by purchase. In proposing the repeal of these penalties, Sir George Saville faid, "that he meant to vindicate the honor and affert the principles of the Protestant religion, to which all persecution was foreign and adverse. The penalties in question were disgraceful, not only to religion, but to humanity. They were calculated to loosen all the bands of society, to dissolve all social, moral, and religious obligations and duties; to poison the sources of domestic felicity, and to annihilate every principle of honor." The motion was received, to the infinite credit of the House, with such high and marked approbation, that the Bill sounded upon it passed without a single negative, and soon afterwards acquired, by the cordial concurrence of the Peers and the Monarch, the sorce of a law.

About this time General Burgoyne returned to England, being released on his parole by Congress; but he met, probably to his furprise, with a very cold and indifferent reception from the Ministers, and, in a manner which clearly indicated his difgrace, was refused admission to the Royal prefence. The General, highly refenting this treatment, avenged himfelf by loud complaints in the House of Commons, of the misconduct of Miniflers, describing them as totally incompetent to fustain the weight of public affairs in the present critical and dangerous emergency. This mode of retaliation, however, contributed little to raife his character in the estimation of the public, who U 4 clearly clearly discerned the real causes of his desection from the Court, who were not ignorant that the plan of the Canada expedition had his entire previous approbation, and that, in the execution of it, his valor was much more conspicuous than his judgment or discretion. In the sequel, he was ordered to rejoin his troops in America, whom, on various frivolous pretences, the Congress resused to release, till the Convention of Saratoga was formally ratisfied by the Court of Great Britain. With this injunction, though coming from the highest authority, the General, resusing to comply, was divested of all the posts and offices which he held under the Government.

This feffion is diftinguished above all others for a multiplicity of motions in both Houses, by different Members, chiefly of the opposition, on various fubjects of political concern, which gave rife to long and tedious debates; and which being fuccessively negatived by the influence of the Court, it is fruitless to particularize. The most remarkable of these was a resolution moved by Mr. Gilbert, in the Committee of Supply, March 2, that a tax of five shillings in the pound be laid on penfions and falaries iffuing out of the Exchequer, during the continuance of the war; which was carried by 100 to 82 voices, but, on the report, rejected by 147 to 141. A Bill for the exclusion of Contractors from the House

House of Commons was also lost by a majority of two voices only; on the motion of commitment, the numbers on the division being 115 to 113. Upon the whole, it appeared that the Minority gained strength, and a dawn of hope arose that the reign of the present Ministry might not be immortal.

On the 3d of June 1778 the Parliament was prorogued, and thanks were returned by the King, in his fpeech, "for the zeal shewn by Parliament in supporting the honor of the Crown, and their attention to the real interests of the Nation, manifested in the wise, just, and humane laws, which had been the result of their deliberations."

At the eve of a war with France, and a war with Spain in no very distant prospect, two disferent lines of conduct now obviously presented themselves. Either, 1st, to withdraw our fleets and armies from America, and to direct the whole force of the empire against the House of Bourbon, in the hope of success so decisive as to enable us in the result to conclude an advantageous accommodation with America, conformably to the general ideas of Lord Chatham; or, 2dly, which would have been infinitely the wiser, though the less splendid and attractive plan, unreservedly to recognize the Independency of America, which would have opened the way, without difficulty, to an immediate and general pacification. But the present Ministers, in the same spirit of folly and phrenfy which had invariably marked their conduct, determined to adhere to their former project of conquering America; contenting themselves with opposing such part of the general force of the empire as could be spared for this fecondary and inferior purpose, to the whole undivided ftrength of the House of Bourbon. " The King of England," fays the celebrated Monarch of Pruffia, speaking of the state of affairs of Great Britain at this period, "who fill acted upon the fystem of Bute, combated with inflexible obstinacy the obstacles which on all fides prefented themselves. Insensible to the miseries and misfortunes of his people, he only became, in consequence of the refisiance he met with, the more eager for the accomplishment of his projects."

In the beginning of June 1778, the new Commissioners, Lord Carlisle, Mr. Eden, and Mr. Johnstone, formerly Governor of Florida, arrived at Philadelphia, more than a month after the ratifications of the treaty between France and America had been formally exchanged. The reception they met with was such as men the most opposite in their politics had foreseen and foretold. Dr. Ferguson, secretary to the commission, was resulted a passport to Congress, and they were compelled to forward their papers by the common means. The Commissioners, at the very outset, made concessions far greater than the Americans, in their feveral petitions to the King, had requested or defiredgreater indeed than the powers conferred upon them by the Act feemed to authorize. Amongst the most remarkable of these was the engagement "to agree that no military force should be kept up in the different States of America, without the confent of the General Congress, or of the several Affemblies—to concur in measures calculated to difcharge the debts of America, and to raife the credit and value of the paper circulation-to admit of Representatives from the several States, who should have a feat and voice in the Parliament of Great Britain—to establish a perfect freedom of legislation and internal government, comprehending every privilege fhort of a total feparation of interests, or consistent with that union of force on which the fafety of the common religion and liberty depends."

These papers, when laid before the Congress, were read with astonishment and regret; but from the declaration of INDEPENDENCE they had neither the will nor the power to recede. An answer therefore, brief but conclusive, was returned by the President Henry Laurens, declaring, "that nothing but an earnest desire to spare the farther effusion of human blood, could have induced them to read a paper containing expressions so disrespectful to his his Most Christian Majesty their ally, or to consider propositions so derogatory to the honor of an independent nation. The commission, under which they act, supposes the people of America to be still fubjects of the Crown of Great Britain, which is an idea utterly inadmiffible." The Prefident added, "that he is directed to inform their Excellencies" of the inclination of Congress to peace, notwithflanding the unjust claims from which this war originated, and the favage manner in which it had been conducted. They will therefore be ready to enter upon the confideration of a treaty of peace and commerce, not inconsistent with treaties already fubfifting, when the King of Great Britain shall demonstrate a fincere disposition for that purpose; and the only solid proof of this disposition will be an explicit acknowledgment of the Independence of the United States, or the withdrawing his fleets and armies."

The Commissioners, finding the door of negotiation shut against them, published very unwarrantable appeals to the people at large, calculated to excite discord among the several Colonies, or seditious tumults against the established Governments. These producing no manner of effect, they promulgated a most signal valedictory manifesto, containing a dark and mysterious menace, warning the people of America of the total and material change which was to take place in the suture conduct of the war, should they still persevere in their OBSTINACY.

The Congress, who had taken little notice of their former addresses, were now provoked to publish a counter-manifesto, in which they say, "If our enemies presume to execute their threats, we will take such Exemplary vengeance as shall deter others from a like conduct." The Commissioners now returned to England, after having executed their conciliatory commission, in a mode which lest America in a far worse state of irritation and inflammability than they found it . The Earl of Carlisle had brought with him an order, little calculated to add weight to his mission, for ^{} Governor Johnstone had very early fallen into extreme difgrace by an indirect attempt to bribe some of the leading Members of the Congress; which Assembly thereupon passed a formal resolution, that they would have no farther intercourse with him in his public capacity, and his name was accordingly omitted in the papers subsequently addressed by the Commissioners to the This ridiculous and ineffectual overture was made through the medium of a Mrs. Ferguson, who was suspected not to have been endowed with all that SECRECY requifite to the discharge of so delicate an office. Governor Johnstone, who, on his first arrival in America, had complimented the Congress in high-flown and extravagant terms, on this mortifying exposure changed his language to the lowest abuse. The fact, however, was clearly afcertained; and the Governor, in his ludicrous diftrefs, might be allowed feelingly enough to exclaim, in the words of SHAKESPEAR.

[&]quot;Let not the Heavens hear these tell-tale women!"

the immediate evacuation of the city of Philadelphia, and the retreat of the army to New York. This was a measure, however mortifying, which was rendered very necessary by the departure of a strong squadron from the port of Toulon in the month of April, which was supposed destined for the Delawar, and which the naval force under Lord Howe was in no condition to oppose.

On the 18th of June the whole British army paffed the Delawar. Some weeks previous to this event, General Howe had refigned the command to Sir Henry Clinton. Though uniformly in a certain degree fuccessful in his enterprises, this officer acquired little acceffion of military reputation in America. Brave as a foldier, but, in the capacity of General, flow, cautious, and indecifive, he deviated into an extreme the opposite of General Burgoyne, who was cenfured as rash, presumptuous, and romantic. The march of the British army through the Jerseys was not unattended with difficulty. Encumbered with an enormous train of baggage, extending the length of twelve miles, the whole country hoftile, the bridges broken down before, and a vigilant enemy preffing close behind, the utmost prudence and gircumspection of the new General were necessary to make a vigorous and effectual defence against those attacks to which a retreating army is fo peculiarly exposed. Instead of proceeding in a direct route to Brunswick, the General General determined, by bending his march to the right, and approaching the fea-coast, at once to disappoint the expectation of the enemy, and to avoid the difficulty attending the passage of the Rariton.

On the evening of the 27th of June the royal army encamped in the vicinity of Monmouth Court-House, and early the next morning they re-commenced their march. Scarcely were they in motion when the enemy were discovered moving in force at fome distance on both flanks: the first division under General Knyphausen, proceeding with the efcort of carriages to the heights of Middletown, the English commander immediately formed his troops, with a view to bring on a general engagement. General Lee, who had been fome time fince exchanged, advanced with the van of the American army to the attack, in conformity to the directions of General Washington; but several of the brigades under his command being thrown into confusion by an impetuous affault of the British cavalry, he ordered a retreat, with a view to form anew in an advantageous position behind a ravine and morafs. In the interim General Washington arrived at the head of the main army, and expressed in strong terms his astonishment and indignation at the retrograde motion of the van. General Lee replied with equal warmth; but in the refult the troops of the van were ordered to form in front of the morafs, where an obstinate engages ment enfued, till the Americans being again worfted and broken, General Lee was again under the necessity of ordering a retreat, which he conducted with great skill and courage, himself being one of the last who remained on the field. The British light infantry and rangers, in the mean time, who had filed off to the left, and attempted an affault on the American main body, where General Washington commanded in person, met with such a reception as compelled them after repeated efforts to defift from the attack; and the day being intenfely hot, the action, in which the two armies appear to have fuftained nearly equal loss, ceased, from mere weariness and fatigue. At midnight Sir Henry renewed his march in profound filence, and on the 30th of June arrived in fafety at Sandyhook, from whence he passed over to New York without farther molestation.

The high fpirit of General Lee could not, however, brook the language which General Washington had hastily used, and he wrote him in consequence a passionate letter, which occasioned his being put under immediate arrest; and a courtmartial being held upon him for disobedience of orders, misbehaviour in action, and disrespect to his commander, he was found guilty upon every charge, and suspended from all his military commands for twelve months. It was suspected that the Commander in Chief was not displeased at the dismissal of a man so haughty and impracticable; nor did the army, in whose estimation he had been visibly lessened since the disaster which had befallen him, appear much to regret his loss. For though the capture of General Lee was merely fortuitous, missortune is in the minds of men nearly allied to disgrace, disgrace produces contempt, and contempt verges towards alienation and hatred.

No fooner had Sir Henry Clinton and the army evacuated Philadelphia, than Lord Howe prepared to fail with the fleet to New York. Repeated calms retarded his paffage down the Delawar, fo that he could not clear the Cape till the evening of the 28th of June; and on the 29th his Lordship reached Sandy Hook, whence he convoyed the army to New York. In a few days after the departure of Lord Howe, Count d'Estaing arrived off the coast, and anchored in the night of the 8th of July at the mouth of the Delawar; so that Lord Howe narrowly escaped a surprise, which would probably have been attended with very satal confequences.

On the 11th the French fleet, confifting of fifteen fail of the line, appeared off Sandy Hook, to which Lord Howe could oppose only eleven ships of very inferior magnitude and weight of metal. These were ranged with great skill and judgment in the harbor, in full expectation of an attack from the French fleet, which seemed resolutely bent upon the attempt. But the American pilots on board declared it impossible for the large ships of D'Estaing's squadron to pass the bar;—so that after eleven days tarriance he sailed to Rhode Island, in order to co-operate with General Sullivan in an enterprise against Newport.

The approach of the French fleet created the unpleafant necessity of burning the Orpheus, Lark, Juno, and Cerberus frigates; and of finking the Flora and Falcon. The commander of the garrifon, Sir Robert Pigot, made every preparation for a vigorous defence; and Lord Howe, being at length reinforced by feveral ships from Englandpart of a fquadron commanded by Admiral Byron, tardily dispatched after the Toulon fleet-immediately stood out to fea, though still inferior in force, in order to give battle to the French admiral, who feemed not unwilling to accept the challenge. After much manœuvring for the weather-gage, the fleets were feparated by a violent tempest, by which the great ships of the French squadron were so much damaged that it was deemed by Count d'Estaing absolutely necessary to steer for the port of Boston to refit. General Sullivan was in consequence compelled with chagrin and reluctance to withdraw his troops from Rhode Island.

After the ftorm, or rather during the ftorm, when the fury of it had in some degree subsided,

the Renown of fifty guns, Captain Dawson, fell in with the Languedoc of ninety guns, D'Estaing's own ship, which had lost both her rudder and her masts, whom he engaged with such advantage as to flatter him with the prospect of an immediate capture, when the appearance of feveral other ships of the fquadron compelled him to defift. Captain Raynor in the Isis, and Captain Hotham in the Preston, both of fifty guns, fought with great gallantry the Zelé of feventy-four, and the Tonnant of eighty-but no ship on either side struck her colors. Lord Howe, with all possible expedition, followed his antagonist to Boston, in the hope of a favorable opportunity of attack; but found the French fleet lying in Nantasket Road, so well defended by the forts and batteries erected on the points of land and the islands adjacent, that it was adjudged absolutely impracticable. Soon after this (October 1778) Lord Howe quitted the command to Admiral Gambier, having acquired in the courfe of the campaign much reputation by his skilful and vigorous exertions in a fituation peculiarly critical and hazardous.

The projects of Count d'Estaing being effectually disconcerted in America, he sailed in the beginning of November to the West Indies, in order to second the operations of the Marquis de Bouillé, Governor of Martinico, who had already captured the important island of Dominique, to which he granted terms fo favorable that the inhabitants had little reason to regret the change of masters. On the very same day that the French fleet lest Boston, a detachment of five thousand troops, under convoy of a finall fquadron commanded by Commodore Hotham, failed from Sandy Hook, and arrived, fortunately without encountering the enemy in their course, at Barbadoes, December 10 (1778). Without fuffering the troops to difembark, an expedition was immediately refolved upon against the island of St. Lucia, where on the 13th a landing was effected. By the active exertions of General Meadows and Admiral Barrington, upon whom the command had now devolved, feveral of the advanced posts were carried, when Count d'Estaing appeared in view with a far fuperior force, having on board a large body of troops, with which he hoped to effect the entire reduction of the English islands. The fquadron of Admiral Barrington confifted only of three ships of the line, two of fifty guns, and three frigates, which he stationed across the entrance of the Careenage, supported by feveral batteries erected on . shore. On the morning of the 15th of December the French admiral bore down with ten fail of the line, but met with fo gallant a reception that he thought proper in a fhort time to draw off. In the afternoon he renewed the attack with his whole fquadron, and a furious cannonade, directed chiefly againft. against Admiral Barrington's division, was kept up for feveral hours, without making any impression upon the English line; and the French admiral was again obliged to defift from his attack. now landed a body of five thousand troops, and putting himself at their head marched with great resolution to the affault of the British lines: but they were received by General Meadows with the fame determined valor as they had before experienced from Admiral Barrington; and being repulfed with great lofs, the Count re-embarked his troops, and left the island to its fate. It foon after furrendered to the British arms on honorable terms of capitulation, and this conquest was considered as much more than an equivalent for the loss of Dominique.

On the continent of America the war still raged with dreadful and unremitted malignity. In consequence of the horrid mode of warfare adopted by the Court of Great Britain, which in the midst of pleasure and festivity issued its orders to desolate and destroy, an expedition was undertaken by a Colonel Butler, in conjunction with one Brandt, an half Indian by birth, and a man beyond example cruel and ferocious, against the beautiful and flourishing settlement of Wyoming. This was an infant rising colony, situated on the eastern branch of the Susquehanna, consisting of eight townships, in a country and climate luxuriantly sertile.

In the month of July 1778 the enemy appeared. in force to the number of about fixteen hundred men, of whom about one-fourth were Indians, and immediately invested the fort. The Commandant, knowing its inability to make any effectual defence. dispatched a flag to Colonel Butler, to know what terms he would grant on a furrender; to which he replied in two words, THE HATCHET. The garrison, though resolute to sell their lives as dear as possible, were foon overpowered; and the favage conquerors, after gratifying their infernal rage by a most bloody military execution, shut up the remainder in the barracks, to which they fet fire, and confumed the whole in one general blaze. The entire fettlement was now delivered up to all the horrors of Indian barbarity, of which the detail is not to be endured. A terrestrial paradise was in a fhort time converted into a frightful wafte; and men, women, and children underwent one common butchery, in all the possible varieties of torture. A Provincial officer, of the name of Bedlock, being stripped naked, had his body stuck full of fharp pine fplinters; and a heap of knots of the fame wood being then piled around him, the whole. was fet on fire-two other officers also, Captains Ransey and Durgie, being thrown alive into the Such are the accurfed confequences of that princely ambition which is exalted fo high above the level of common life as to admit of no fympathy fympathy with human mifery. Feeling deeply for the honor of Britain, a veil has been perhaps too partially cast over the enormities committed by the Indians employed in the northern expedition, and in other parts of the Continent. There are indeed degrees of human depravity and wickedness creative of sensations which no tongue can express, and no language impart **.

To descend to what must be regarded as an authorized and civilized mode of warfare, it is necessary to mention that Major General Grey, an officer who had repeatedly distinguished himself by his military skill and courage, was detached in the month of September from New York on an expedition to a place called Fair-Haven, on the coast of New England, where he destroyed about seventy sail of shipping, together with the magazines, wharfs, stores, &c.; and proceeding to Martha's Vineyard, a beautiful island in the vicinity, he carried off an immense booty in oxen and sheep, which afforded a welcome supply to the army at New York.

^{* &}quot;They ERR who count it glorious to subdue
By conquest far and wide, to over-run
Large countries—deserving freedom more Than those their conquerors, who leave behind
Nothing but ruin wheresoe'er they rove,
And all the flourishing works of peace destroy—
Then swell with pride, and must be titled Gods."

In a fhort time after this, the same officer, acting under the direction of Lord Cornwallis, furprifed in the night, afleep and naked, a regiment of American light-horse, stationed near the right bank of the North River. Quarter being refused. and the men wholly incapable of refistance, a terrible execution took place, which the Congress in a fubsequent remonstrance scrupled not to stigmatize as "a massacre in cold blood." A fimilar enterprise was undertaken with fimilar success by Captain Ferguson, against a detached corps of Pulawski's legion of light infantry; and the Americans were not a little embarraffed to conjecture what those worse extremes of war could be, which the manifesto of the Commissioners menaced them with in the future conduct of it.

An undertaking of greater importance was now determined upon by Sir Henry Clinton, who detached a confiderable body of troops under the command of Colonel Campbell, convoyed by a fquadron under Sir Hyde Parker, to attempt the recovery of the province of Georgia—General Prevoft, Governor of East Florida, having at the same time orders to co-operate with them. On the 23d of December 1778, the whole armament arrived at the mouth of the Savannah. The force which that weak and infant colony was able to oppose to the invaders was soon dispersed, and the town of Savannah sell of course into the hands of the the victors. General Prevost soon after arriving with a large re-inforcement, took upon him the command of the whole.

in the state of the

From this sketch of the campaign of 1778 in America, it is now expedient to advert to the situation of affairs in Europe. When a war with France appeared inevitable, Admiral Keppel, an officer of distinguished merit and reputation, but wholly unconnected with the present Ministers, was, on the personal and urgent solicitation of the King, prevailed on to accept the command of the channel sleet, though, as he himself observed, "his forty years services were not marked by any favor from the Crown, except that of its considence in the time of danger." The admiral, at parting, might with propriety have said to his Sovereign, as Marechal Villars to Louis XIV. "I go to fight your Majesty's enemies, and leave mine in your closet."

On the 13th of June the admiral failed from St. Helen's with twenty thips of the line, and at the entrance of the Bay of Bifcay he fell in with the Licorne and the Belle Poule, two French frigates. Through that feebleness and indecision of counsels which prevailed at this period in the British Cabinet, the admiral had no positive orders as to the commission or avoidance of actual hostilities, but was invested with an unmeaning and, as to himself, dangerous discretion of acting according to circumstances. Perceiving the frigates intent on taking an accurate furvey of his fleet, he thought it expedient to fire a gun in order to compel them to bring to; and on their refusal to obey the fignal a chace enfued, when the Licorne, after wantonly discharging a whole broadside, struck to the America of feventy-four guns. The Belle Poule, after a warm engagement with the Arethufa, efcaped by running on shore. The Pallas also, another French frigate, was in the mean time captured and detained. From the papers found on board these frigates, the admiral discovered to his inexpressible assonishment that the French fleet, lying in Brest water, amounted to no less than thirty-two fail of the line: he was therefore under the immediate necessity of returning to port for a reinforcement; and, on transmitting accounts of his proceedings to Government, he received no intimation of approbation or disapprobation.

On the 9th of July, however, he was enabled again to fail with twenty-four ships, and was soon afterwards joined by fix more. In a few days he came in fight of the French fleet, commanded by M. d'Orvilliers, who seemed, on perceiving the English fleet nearly equal in force, inclined to avoid an engagement; but the wind changing some points in savor of the English, they gained so much upon the enemy that an engagement became inevitable, and the French ranging in order of battle, but on the opposite tack, the fleets passed each other about noon in a diagonal direction. The action, though very warm, was confequently partial; but the English admiral having in a short. time fufficiently repaired his damages, made the proper fignals for the van and rear divisions to take their respective stations. This order was instantly obeyed by Sir Robert Harland, of the van; but Admiral Sir Hugh Pallifer, of the rear or blue division, who had fallen a great way to leeward. took no notice whatever of the fignals, Admiral Keppel, after waiting perhaps too long, fent the Fox frigate at five o'clock with peremptory directions to Sir Hugh Pallifer, to bear down into his wake in order to renew the engagement. Sir Hugh answered, "that he was knotting and splicing, but would obey the order as foon as poffible."

At fix o'clock the commander threw out another fignal for ALL SHIPS to come into their flations; and at feven o'clock, wearied with expectation, he threw out a third fignal, for each particular ship of the blue division to come into her station in the line—but all to no purpose, and the day finally closed before Sir Hugh Palliser rejoined his commander. In the night the French made sail for their own coast, and in the morning scarcely were the rearmost ships discernible from the topmast heads of the English sleet. Admiral Keppel therefore returned to Portsmouth to rest; but his public public letter, containing an account of this transaction, occasioned great speculation—his defire to fereen the misconduct of the admiral of the blue inducing him to give such a relation of this engagement as seemed to imply great impropriety of behaviour in the commander himself. For no reason whatever was assigned for not renewing the engagement in the asternoon, except the expectation of the admiral, "that the French would fight it out handsomely the next day."

It was impossible that the truth should not in some degree transpire; and a well written letter appearing some time afterwards in the public prints, severely reflecting on the conduct of Sir Hugh Palliser, that officer thought proper to require from the commander in chief a formal disavowal of the charges it contained, and a public justification of his character. This the commander absolutely and indignantly declining, the vice admiral immediately exhibited articles of accusation against Admiral Keppel, for misconduct and neglect of duty on the 27th of July (1778), although he had in the month of October a second time sailed with Admiral Keppel, and had never before this so much as whispered a word to his prejudice.

The Lords of the Admiralty, to the aftonishment of the nation, without the least hesitation, and even with apparent alacrity and satisfaction, fixed a day for the trial of the Commander in Chief; the result of which was in the highest degree honorable to that brave and injured officer, who was not only unanimously acquitted by the court-martial, but received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament for his fervices. Sir Hugh Pallifer afterwards demanded a court-martial upon himself, which terminated in a flight cenfure only; but the refentment of the public was fo great that it was deemed expedient by the Ministers to accept his successive refignations of his place at the Board of Admiralty, his Lieutenant-Generalship of Marines, his Government of Scarborough Castle, and to permit him to vacate his feat in the House of Com-The acquittal of Admiral Keppel was celebrated with illuminations and rejoicings in all parts of the kingdom; and the houses of Lord Sandwich and Sir Hugh Pallifer were infulted by the populace, and the demolition of them with difficulty prevented.

The ready acquiescence of the Board of Admiralty in the appointment of the court-martial, on a charge so grossly invidious and unjust, gave the highest disgust to the officers of the navy. A strong memorial was presented to his Majesty on the subject by the Duke of Bolton, signed by twelve admirals, with the venerable Hawke at their head, stating to his Majesty, in strong colors, the ruinous consequences which the precedent now introduced would inevitably bring upon all naval service and discipline, discipline. "If," said these gallant desenders of their country, "we had conceived that this Board had no legal use of their reason in a point of such delicacy and importance, we should have known on what terms we served; but we never did imagine it possible that we were to receive orders from, and be accountable to, those who by law were reduced to become mere passive instruments to the possible ignorance, malice, or treachery of any individual, who might think sit to disarm his Majesty's navy of its best and highest officers. We conceive it to be disrespectful to the laws of our country, to suppose them capable of such manifest injustice and absurdity."

The only part of Admiral Keppel's conduct really culpable appears to have proceeded from that excess of descrence and respect for Sir Hugh Palliser, which prevented his adopting those daring and decisive measures the occasion called for, in order to improve in the most effectual manner an opportunity of which he had little reason to expect the return. The courage of Sir Hugh Palliser had been on many occasions too conspicuous to be questioned; but that principle of envy, so powerful in some minds, could not endure that a man whom he regarded in the light of a rival should acquire such an addition of same and superiority as must have resulted from a complete and decided victory.

The SESSION commenced on the 26th of November 1778. The speech from the throne was loud in complaint of "the unexampled and unprovoked hostility of the Court of France; and regret was expressed that the efforts which had been made for disappointing the malignant designs of the enemy had not been attended with all the fuccess which the justice of the cause, and the vigorous exertions which had been made, feemed to promife." The addresses of both Houses, in the usual style of duty and loyalty, were carried by great majorities. But in a fhort time the attention of Parliament was attracted by a motion made by the Marquis of Rockingham, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, to express the displeafure of the House at the manifesto issued under the feal of the American Commissioners on the 3d day of October last; and to acquaint his Majesty with the fense of this House, that the said Commissioners had no authority whatfoever under the Act of Parliament, in virtue of which they were appointed, to make fuch declaration; and humbly befeeching that the faid manifesto be publicly disavowed by his Majesty." The noble mover, in the course of an able and excellent speech, addressed himself to the BISHOPS in a manner peculiarly striking. He observed that "the nature and principle of the war were entirely changed. The right reverend Bench, relying on the affurances of Ministers, might originally ginally have believed its motives honorable, and its object easily attainable; but the same Ministers now declared to all the world, that a totally new fystem of policy was adopted; America was relinquished, and a new species of war denounced; tending merely and avowedly to revenge, flaughter, and universal destruction. The simple votes of their Lordships on this occasion would at once fully express their detestation of the inhuman system in question, and, in conjunction with those of the Tem= poral Lords, who entertained the same sentiments. would fully obviate its effects." After a vehement debate, in which the Ministers endeavored, by refinements of explanation, to palliate what no one dared explicitly to defend, the motion was negatived by a majority of 71 to 37 Peers, 31 of whom joined in a protest of uncommon energy and abidity. "The public law of nations," faid their Lord= ships, "in affirmance of the dictates of nature and the precepts of religion, forbids us to refort to the extremes of war upon our own opinion of their expediency, or in any case to carry on war for the purpose of desolation. We are shocked to see the first law of nature, 'sclf-preservation,' perverted and abused into a principle destructive of all other laws. Those objects of war which cannot be compassed by fair and honorable hostility, ought not to be compassed at all. An end that has no means but fuch as are unlawful, is an unlawful end," is painful to remark, that the name of one Bifhop only, the venerable Shipley of St. Afaph, is to be found in the long and illustrious train of fignatures affixed to this memorable protest; which, if it wanted any other recommendation to notice than its own intrinsic merit, might with pride recount the names of a Rockingham, a Camden, a Portland, an Effingham, a Harcourt, and many others, inferior neither in wisdom nor in virtue to any which this age or country could boast.

Some time after the Christmas recess, Mr. Fox moved a vote of cenfure upon Lord Sandwich, for fending Admiral Keppel, with twenty ships of the line only, to a station off the coast of France, thereby hazarding the fafety of the kingdom, the Breft fleet confifting at that time of thirty-two fhips of the line, befides a great fuperiority of frigates. Mr. Fox faid, if the present motion was carried, he should follow it with another, for the removal of the First Lord of the Admiralty. This Nobleman had deservedly incurred the public refentment and odium by the countenance he had given to the late profecution of Admiral Keppel. Of this he now felt the effect, the motion of cenfure being negatived, in a very full House, by a majority of 34 voices only. Encouraged by the unaccustomed strength of the minority on this occasion, Mr. Fox in a few days moved, " That Vol. II.

"That the state of the Navy, at the breaking out of the present war, was inadequate to the exigencies of the service." This motion he enforced in a speech of singular ability. In the course of the debate, Lord Howe declared his resolution to decline all future service, so long as the present Ministers continued in office. A decisive experience had taught him, that besides risquing his honor and professional character in such an attempt, he could not, under such counsels, render any essential service to his country. The whole sorce of the Ministry being exerted to parry this attack, the motion was at length rejected, by a majority of 246 to 174 voices.

The indulgence flewn in the last session to the Roman Catholics, made the resusal of the claim of the Protestant Dissenters appear so extremely invidious on the part of the Court, that it was judged improper longer to discourage the application for their relief; and on the motion of Sir Henry Houghton, seconded by Mr. Frederic Montague, a Bill for that purpose was brought in, and passed through both Houses with very trivial opposition. The debate in the House of Lords was, however, rendered memorable, by a very remarkable speech of Dr. Shipley, Bishop of St. Asaph, the friend and disciple of HOADLEY, and on whom the mantle of that illustrious prelate seemed in an especial manner to have descended.

His Lordship expressed "his most cordial acquiescence in the repeal of those penal laws which had long been the difgrace of the National Church:—he objected only to the condition annexed to the repeal—the imposition of a Confession of Faith, however short and general and true—fuch as he hoped he should have the virtue, if called upon, to feal with his blood. But his Lordship absolutely disclaimed, for himself, any authority civil or facred to impose this creed upon other men. By fuch imposition the present Bill, which professes to repeal all former penal laws, is converted into a penal law itself; for those who do not subscribe the declaration still remain liable to all the old penalties. The truth contained in the declaration, viz. . That the Scriptures are the revealed will of GoD, and the rule of faith and practice,' was indeed acknowledged by every Protestant. But supposing the existence of any fet of Christians who should reject our Canon of Scripture, who should build their faith on the basis of tradition, or on the supposed illuminations of the Spirit, would you, my Lords, persecute them for believing Christianity upon arguments that suit their own understandings? Such men would undoubtedly be in error, but error in religion is the very ground and fubject of toleration. The evils refulting from this declaration are not however confined to possibilities. Many of the most eminent of the Diffenting Ministers-men highly deferving esteem for their science, their literature, their critical study of the Scriptures, for their excellent writings in defence of Christianity, as well as of the civil and religious rights of mankind;men, whom it would be no disparagement to this Bench to acknowledge as friends and brethren, engaged in the fame honorable and arduous talk of instructing the world in the ways of happinefs:-fuch men as thefe, my Lords, if the clause in question be enacted and carried into execution, will not even be tolerated. Declaring, as they have invariably done, against all human authority in matters of religion, and holding it as a first principle of Protestantism, that no church has a right to impose its own articles of faith upon others, they conceive that an acquiescence in this declaration would imply a recognition of that claim which they are bound as Christians and Protestants to refist. It is the duty of Magistrates, it is indeed the very end of Magistracy, to protect all men in the enjoyment of their natural rights, of which the free exercife of their religion is one of the first and best. All history, my Lords, is full of the mischiefs occasioned by the want of toleration; but no one has ever yet pretended to show that any public evils have been occasioned by toleration. At a meeting of the Right Rev. Bench, where I had the honour to be prefent, it was afked, asked, whether the clause in question was ever intended to be put in execution?' It was answered, 'No, there was no fuch intention.' I asked then, and I ask now, 'What was the use of making laws that were never to be executed?' To make useless and infignificant laws, is not to exercise authority, but to degrade it; it is a vain, idle, and infolent parade of legislation: and yet, my Lords, would to Gop the four last shameful and miserable years had been employed in making fuch laws as these! this wretched country might still have been fafe, and perhaps once more might have been happy. But, my Lords, let us for a moment confider to whom this power of preferibing Articles of Faith is to be confided: - undoubtedly this holy deposit cannot fail to be lodged where we have placed every thing else that is great and good-the honour, the interest, the strength, and revenues of the nation-ALL are placed in the keeping of the MINISTRY. Perhaps, my Lords, there might be Ministers, to whose management none who have the least value for their religion would choose to confide it. One might naturally ask a Minister for a good pension, or a good contract, or a place at Court; but hardly any one would think of making interest with them for a place in HEAVEN. What I now fay applies only to future bad Ministers, for of the present Administration I most firmly believe that they are fully Y_3 fully as capable of defining Articles of Faith as of directing the Counsels of the State. The ruling party is always very liberal in bestowing the title of Schifmatic and Heretic on those who differ from them in religion, and in representing them as dangerous to the State. My Lords, the contrary is the truth. Those who are uppermost, and have the power, are the men who do the mifchief, while the Schifmatics only fuffer and complain. Ask, who has brought the affairs of this country into the present calamitous state? Who are the men that have plundered and depopulated Bengal? Who are they that have turned a whole Continent, inhabited by friends and kindred, into our bitterest enemies? Yes! they who have shorn the ftrength and cut off the right arm of Britain, were all members of the ESTABLISHED CHURCH, all orthodox men. I am not afraid of those tender and ferupulous confeiences who are overcautious of professing or believing too much: if they are fincerely in the wrong, I forgive their errors, and respect their integrity. The men I am afraid of, are the men who believe every thing, and subscribe every thing, and who vote for every thing."-Upon the whole, it appears but too evident, that the final fuccess of the Bill, from which the objectionable clause was not suffered to be expunged, must be attributed not to the candor and equity of the Court, but to the general spirit and temper temper of the times, which were at this period happily and ftrongly at variance with the spirit of persecution and intolerance.

A far more doubtful and difficult fubject of discussion presented itself, in contemplating the ftate political and commercial of the kingdom of Ireland; which, by the continuance of the prefent ruinous war, was now reduced to the most extreme and urgent distress. Lord Newhaven, in concert with various other respectable members particularly connected with that kingdom, attempted to revive the propofitions of the last year with some new modifications, but without effect. At length it was carried by a finall majority to repeal that clause in the Act of Navigation in favor of Ireland, by which fhips coming from the West Indies were compelled to bring their cargoes directly to England. But this indulgence being opposed by the commercial cities of England, on a fubsequent motion for the House to resolve itself into a Committee, the Minifter declared himself adverse to the measure, and it was finally loft by a majority of four voices.

A third motion by Mr. Fox, "for the removal of the Earl of Sandwich from his Majesty's person and councils for ever, was negatived by 221 voices to 118. The Howes, impatient of the obloquy thrown upon them by the partisans of the Court, had earnestly solicited a parliamentary enquiry into their conduct in America; to which the Minister at length very reluctantly affented. A multitude of papers were in confequence laid upon the table; and the House resolving itself into a Committee of Enquiry, Lord Cornwallis, Sir Charles Grey, Sir Guy Carleton, and various other officers of high reputation who had ferved in America, were examined at the bar of the House; and the refult of a long and tedious investigation was in general, "That the force fent to America was at no time equal to the fubjugation of that Continent; that the people of America were almost unanimous in their enmity and refistance to Great Britain; that the nature of the country was beyond any other difficult and impracticable for military operations; and that there was no fairer prospect of success, in any subsequent attempt at conquest, than in those which had been already made." On the 29th of June 1779, the Committee was fuddenly diffolved without coming to a fingle resolution on any part of the business.

In the House of Lords, the Earl of Bristol moved an Address to the King, similar to that of Mr. Fox, for the removal of the Earl of Sandwich. His Lordship supported this motion in a speech, containing a very extensive display of political and professional knowledge. This Nobleman affirmed, "that about seven millions more money had been allotted for the support and increase of our Navy during the last seven years, years, than in any former equal period; and that, during this time, the decrease and decline of the navy had been in an inverse ratio to the excess of the expenditure. While fuch has been the unbounded liberality of Parliament; what, exclaimed the Noble Lord, is become of our navy? or, if there is no navy, what is become of our money?" The motion was rejected by 78 voices to 39. Notwithstanding these repeated acquittals, the reputation of Lord Sandwich fuffered not a little, by this fuccession of attacks, in the estimation of the public. A fhort time before the prorogation, a Royal meffage was fomewhat unexpectedly delivered to both Houses, on a subject of the highest importance, informing them, that a Manifesto had been presented to his Majesty by the Count d'Almodovar, Ambassador of the King of Spain, containing a declaration of hostility on the part of the Catholic King, who had in confequence ordered his Ambaffador to depart without taking leave. The disclosure of this alarming event, so long predicted by the Minority, called forth all their powers of eloquence and invective. The Minifters were reminded of their blindness, obstinacy, and incredulity on this fubject-of the contempt with which they had treated every warning of danger-and of their repeated and triumphant declarations "that Spain could have no interest in joining our enemies-Spain had colonies of her own, and would not fet so bad an example as to afford aid or succor to our rebellious colonies. The honor, sincerity, and sidelity of the Court of Spain were held up as facred, and thus was Parliament and the Nation kept in a constant state of delusion until they were awakened from their dream by the imminence of the impending ruin." The Address, however, containing the fullest affurances of support, was unanimously agreed to. But a subsequent motion of Lord John Cavendish, for the withdrawment of the troops from America, was evaded by a question of adjournment.

In confequence of the acknowledged necessity of new and unprecedented exertions, a plan was formed by the Minister for augmenting the militia to double the actual number: and a Bill for that purpose passed the Commons without difficulty, but met with an unexpected opposition with the Lords, and on a division the compulsory clause was thrown out by a majority of 39 to 22 voices; the Lord Prefident Lord Gower, and both the Secretaries of State, giving their votes against it. A solitary provision for raising volunteer companies only remained; and in this ftate it was returned to the Commons, to the great chagrin of the Minister, who openly complained of the defertion of his colleagues in office; nor was his mortification leffened by the taunts of the Opposition, who remarked, that the difunion and difcord which the Administration had been the means of fpreading throughout the empire, had now feized the Cabinet, and was equally visible amongst themselves.

On the 3d of July, the King closed the fession with a speech, in which his Majesty mentioned it as a happy omen of the fuccess of his arms. that the increase of difficulties seemed only to augment the courage and constancy of the nation. The Memorial of Count d'Almodovar, and a long justificatory Manifesto subsequently published by the Court of Madrid, were filled with heavy complaints of the conduct of the English Court for feveral years past, though certainly grounded on no folid reason; the King of England truly affirming in his message to Parliament, " That with regard to Spain he had nothing to reproach himfelf with; and that his defire to cultivate peace and amity with that power, had been uniform and fincere." The Court of Madrid pretended, that the infults and incredible violences offered to the Spanish traders by England from the year 1776 to the beginning of the prefent year 1779, were no less than 86 in number, fince which other infults and injuries had been offered; fo that the whole amount arose to the precise and full complement of one hundred. The only circumstance really important and interesting in this fingular Manifesto, is the discovery that the mediation of Spain had been offered and accepted by Great Britain and France foon after the commencement of hostilities, and that a negotiation between these two Courts had been actually carried on for the space of eight months.

On the 14th of September, immediately fubfequent to the arrival of the Count d'Almodovar in London, Lord Weymouth declared to his Excellency, that the King of England most fincerely defired to terminate the prefent war, by the mediation of his Catholic Majesty. In consequence of which, the King of Spain, after much difeuffion, proposed a general truce for a term of years, in order to allow time for the final accommodation of differences. In his ultimatum of the 3d of April 1778, he offered the City of Madrid for the holding of a General Congress for this purpose, to which the Colonies should be admitted to fend Commissioners, and in the mean time to be treated as an Independent Power; and that a general difarming flould take place within one month in Europe, and four months in America; his Catholic Majesty offering at the same time his guarantee of the definitive treaty. The Manifesto ftates, "That the Court of London objected to recognizing the Independency of America during the continuance of the truce; and it forcibly urges, as a thing very extraordinary, and even ridiculous, that the Minister, Lord North, had, notwithftanding this objection, propofed in the English House of Commons, that the Congress should be treated with as the Plenipotentiaries of Independent States, on the very provifo fuggested by Spain, that this concession should not be understood to preclude the subsequent possible relinquishment of that independency. The Convention of Saratoga, the cartel fettled for the exchange of prifoners, the nomination of Commissioners to fupplicate the Americans for peace at their own doors, are, it is afferted, real and unequivocal acknowledgements of the Independency of America. The English nation itself is appealed to by his Catholic Majesty: 'whether these acts are more confonant with the dignity of the British Crown, than would be the granting, at the intercession of his Catholie Majesty, a suspension of hostilities for the adjustment of differences, and the treating them in this interval as Independent States.' Nevertheless the English Court positively refused, as the Manifesto proceeds to affirm, its affent to the propositions contained in this ultimatum; declaring, moreover, that France should not interfere in the arrangement of the interests of those she affects to call her allies: and, in fine, the English Court had the effrontery to fay, that the drift of Spain was to form, from the pretentions of the Colonies to independence, one common cause with them and with France. On the contrary, his Catholic Majesty declares, that these last proposals were not even communicated to France before they were transmitted mitted to the Court of London; fo that the haughty expressions of the English Ministry amount merely to this conclusion, 'that in spite of the overture made by themselves, they prefer war to peace, or a treaty under the mediation of the Catholic King, whom they provokingly infulted, treating him as partial, inconfiftent, and leagued with the enemies of Great Britain: notwithstanding which his Catholic Majesty did not issue orders for reprifals, but in confequence of the actual commencement of hostilities on the part of Great Britain." Upon the whole it is evident, from the explicit and curious detail of the whole negotiation given in this Manifesto, clothed as it is in the flately language of Castilian pride, tinctured with abfurdity, that Spain acted in this bufiness with generosity, openness, and honor. It was undoubtedly determined by both branches of the House of Bourbon, to establish the permanent independency of America; but this Spain at least wished to effect without involving herself in a war with England; and the expedient fuggefted by his Catholic Majesty, was certainly the wifest and best which in present circumstances could be adopted; but the pride of the English Court was not yet fufficiently humbled to affent to the emancipation of America, though the idea of fubjugation became every day more palpably chimerical and extravagant.

During the recess of Parliament, the Earl of Stormont, late Ambaffador at Paris, was made Secretary of State in the room of the Earl of Suffolk deceased. The Earl of Weymouth a second time refigned the Seals of the Southern Department, which were transferred to the Earl of Hillfborough; and Earl Bathurst, late Chancellor of Great Britain, was nominated Prefident of the Council, in the room of Earl Gower. The Great Seal had been configned, in the course of the preceding year, to the Attorney-General Thurlow, created Baron Thurlow, a man endowed by nature with uncommon talents, which were concealed, and in effect loft to the world, under an almost impervious veil of moroseness, bigotry, and malevolence.

The state of affairs on the other side of the Atlantic once more demands our attention. The reduction of Georgia by General Prevost and Col. Campbell, though in itself of no great importance, excited just alarm in the inhabitants of the Carolinas, which were protected only by their own militia, and an inconsiderable body of Continental troops under the command of General Lincoln, who lay encamped at Purisburg, on the north side of the river Savannah, about twenty miles above the town of that name. At the end of April 1779, this officer left that advantageous position, which enabled him effectually to cover the province, vince, and marched along the banks of the river to Augusta, where he expected to be joined by powerful reinforcements; and he hoped, by paffing the river, to cut off the communication of General Prevost with the back country, whence he received his fupplies. But General Prevoft was no fooner apprifed of this movement, than he determined to pass the Savannah at Purisburg, and make a rapid march towards Charlestown. the finall force left by General Lincoln to guard the paffage of the Savannah was not able to prevent; and the English army, confisting of about 4000 men, including Indians, arrived in the vicinity of that city on the 11th of May. To the chagrin of the English General, he found the place strongly fortified and well fecured by the numerous militia which had now collected for its defence. After fummoning the city in vain to furrender, he determined, on hearing that General Lincoln was on his march back to Carolina, to decamp that very night, and took post, after some detours, in the island of Port Royal, to the South of Charlestown harbor. In the mean time Sir Henry Clinton was engaged, in conformity to the policy of the English Court, whence he derived his instructions, in various predatory expeditions. Sir George Collier and General Matthew, in a defcent upon Virginia, burnt the town of Suffolk, and destroyed the veffels, provisions and stores found there, and at Gosport, Jenner's Creek, and various other places in that quarter. Sir H. Clinton in person, proceeded up the North River, and carried, by great exertions of gallantry, the two important posts of Stoney Point and Verplanks, which the Americans had diligently fortified to preferve the communication between the Eastern and Western Colonies. Another expedition under Sir George Collier, Governor Tryon commanding the land forces, was projected nearly at the same timeagainst Newhaven in Connecticut, which they plundered, and afterwards proceeded to Fairfield and Norwalk, which they laid in ashes; and also the buildings and farm-houses to the compass of two miles round. At the fame time a Proclamation was iffued by them, declaring "the existence of a fingle house on the coast to be a striking monument of British mercy." A far more important enterprise was next undertaken by the same officer, for the relief of a fortress lately constructed at the mouth of the river Penobscot, in the eastern confines of New England, and garrifoned by a detachment of King's troops from Nova Scotia. This post had been for some time closely invested by an armament of considerable force from Boston, which was attacked lying in the river, and almost entirely destroyed by Sir George Collier, who took two frigates of twenty and eighteen guns, the remainder to the amount of feventeen veffels being stranded and burnt. The fuperior weight of metal on the part of the English Commodore, who hoisted his broad pendant on board the Raisonnable, of 64 guns, and whose whole fquadron confifted of fix fhips only, far more than counterbalanced the superiority of numbers on the part of the enemy. On the other hand, the Americans were not without their fuccesses. After the capture of Stoney Point and Verplanks by the English, no pains were spared to make them impregnable to the attacks of the enemy: notwithstanding which, a plan was formed by the American General Wayne, for the furprifal of this post, which was carried into execution with great refolution on the night of the 15th of July. Neither the deep morass in front of the lines, the double rows of abattis, or the inceffant and tremendous fire from the batteries, could damp the ardor of the troops, who, attacking with fixed bayonets, carried the works with refiftless intrepidity. The elemency of the conquerors was no less conspicuous than their bravery; for though they had repeatedly been refused quarter in fimilar fituations, the lives of more than 500 men, who threw down their arms, were generoufly granted.

In a few days, another British post at Paulus Hook was surprised in a similar manner; but a better desence being made, the Americans, after storming two redoubts, were repulfed, and obliged to retire, not however without carrying off with them near 200 prifoners.

In the West Indies, soon after the defeat of D'Estaing at St. Lucie, Admiral Barrington was joined by Admiral Byron; and the English fleet being now superior to that of the French, endeayours were used to force the enemy to a general engagement; but they chose, rather than encounter this rifque, to remain inactive in the harbor of Fort Royal. Admiral Byron, however, deeming it expedient to convoy the trade ships collected at St. Christopher's in June, part of their voyage; Count d'Estaing took the opportunity of detaching a confiderable force to the Island of St. Vincent, which furrendered, though garrifoned by feven companies of regular troops, without firing a fhot. This is afcribed to the dread entertained of an infurrection of the Caribbs, who still entertained a deep refentment of the injuries they had fustained. The French Commander, being now joined by a large reinforcement of ships and troops, failed with twenty-fix thips of the line from Fort-Royal in the beginning of July, and steered his course to the Island of Grenada, which, though bravely defended by the Governor Lord Macartney, was compelled in a fhort time to furrender at difere-Admiral Byron on his return, receiving intelligence of the capture of St. Vincent's, im-Z 2 mediately mediately determined to make an effort for its recovery; but, on his passage thither, heard the ftill more unwelcome tidings of the attack of Grenada, of which he now resolved to attempt the relief.

On the 6th of July the two fleets came in fight; but the French, having already effected their purpose, were little inclined, notwithstanding their present superiority, to risque a close engagement. A warm but indecifive action enfued between the van divisions of the two fleets, in the course of which the English discovered to their aftonishment the French colors flying on the fortress of St. George. In the refult, the English fleet bore away for Antigua, and the French returned to Grenada.

Count d'Estaing being fully informed of the critical fituation of the Southern Provinces of America, now, unexpectedly directing his course to Georgia, made an eafy capture of the Experiment of 50 guns, with fupplies of various kinds on board for Savannah, and three other frigates, which he fell in with on his way.

On the 9th of September he anchored off the mouth of the Savannah, to which General Prevoft had again retired, and fent a haughty fummons to that officer to furrender to the arms of his Most Christian Majesty; to which a spirited answer was returned. The fucceeding day, Count d'Estaing being joined by General Lincoln, a regular fiege commenced, which was fustained with great vigor by General Prevolt, affifted by the masterly exertions of Colonel Moncrieff, the Chief Engineer. At length the French Commander, being impatient at the flow progress made in the fiege, determined upon a general affault; and after a heavy cannonade, the allies advanced to the attack of the British lines on the morning of the 9th of October. They were every where repulfed with heroic valor. Count d'Estaing himself being wounded in the action, and the troops having furtained great loss, the fiege was converted into a blockade, and in a few days entirely raifed. A precipitate retreat was made by the Americans, and the Count retired to the West Indies; whence he quickly returned to France, much chagrined at the final disappointment of the vast hopes and projects which he had originally formed.

being

Sir Henry Clinton, alarmed at the intelligence of the arrival of the French fleet on the coaft, and expecting an attack on New York, had fent orders to General Pigott for the evacuation of Rhode Island, of which the English had now been in possession three years. But on being fully certified that the French fleet had departed for the West Indies, he resumed the project which he had formed of a grand expedition against South Carolina. On the 26th of December 1779, Sir Henry Z 2

Clinton failed with the greater part of the army from New York, under convoy of a fleet commanded by Admiral Arbuthnot; and after a tedious and unprosperous voyage, in which much mischief was done, through the tempeftuoufness of the weather, to the transports and victuallers, the armament arrived off Charlestown bar, which the men of war passed with some difficulty on the 20th of March (1780), the water rifing only nineteen feet in high fpring tides. On the 1st of April the British troops broke ground at the distance of about eleven hundred yards in front of the American lines; which, though no more than field works, the English General, willing to spare the effusion of blood, treated with the respectful homage of three parallels-and made his advances with great circumfpection. It does not appear that any confiderable exertions were made by the Americans for the relief of this important place, though defended by General Lincoln in person with a sufficiently numerous garrifon; which, if the inhabitants had not shewn an insuperable reluctance to abandon the town, might probably with more advantage have taken the field in conjunction with the expected reinforcements. The fecond parallel being completed on the 20th of April, it was thought expedient to propose terms of capitulation, on condition of the garrifon being allowed to withdraw; but this condition was rejected by the English glish General without hesitation. In a few days the third parallel being carried within one hundred and fifty yards of the American lines, and preparations being made for a general affault; General Lincoln, on being informed by the engineers that the lines were no longer defensible, feeing no profpect of relief, and the flesh provisions remaining in store not being sufficient to furnish rations for a week, confented to deliver up the city on the terms originally proposed by Sir Henry Clinton; in confequence of which about fix thousand men, confifting of continental troops, militia, and failors, became prisoners of war. This event took place on May 4th 1780. During the fiege Colonel Tarleton, who commanded a legion of cavalry, particularly diftinguished himself by the activity and fuccess of his enterprises.

The capital having furrendered, the next object was to fecure the general fubmiffion of the inhabitants: to this end, a large body of troops under Lord Cornwallis marched over the Santee, towards that frontier which borders upon the most populous parts of North Carolina. This movement caused an immediate retreat of such corps as had been there collected for the relief of Charlestown. One of these was unexpectedly attacked and surrounded by Tarleton's legion, which had marched one hundred and sive miles in fifty-four hours. A very seeble resistance was made, and by far the greater part immediately threw down their arms, and begged for quarter: but a few continuing to fire, the British cavalry were ordered to charge, and a terrible slaughter was made amongst the unarmed and unresisting Americans; and from this time Tarleton's quarter became proverbial. Soon after this Sir Henry Clinton returned to New York, leaving the command in Carolina to Lord Cornwallis.

During these transactions in America much alarm had been created in England by the junction of the fleets of France and Spain, which took place very foon after the delivery of the Spanish manifesto. In August 1779, they entered the channel to the amount of fixty-five ships of the line, accompanied by a cloud of frigates, floops, and firefhips. The English fleet, commanded by Sir Charles Hardy, who had received no infiructions to prevent this formidable junction, being utterly unable to encounter fo prodigious a force, was compelled to retire to the narrow part of the channel, whilft the flags of France and Spain menaced and infulted the English coasts without molestation or control. Plymouth was, by the unaccountable negligence of the Ministers, left so entirely destitute of the means of defence, that the docks and shipping in the harbor might have been destroyed without difficulty. Fortunately this was not known to the confederate commanders; and on the approach of the the equinox Count d'Orvilliers steered his course back to Breft, without effecting any thing farther than the capture of the Ardent man of war, which had accidentally fallen in with the combined fleets. But the most remarkable consequence resulting from the appearance of this vast armament in the British seas, was the extraordinary vigor and resolution with which it fuddenly inspired the inhabitants of the kingdom of Ireland, who had hitherto contented themselves with seeble lamentations and unavailing complaints. Seeing themselves in a manner abandoned by England, their troops withdrawn, their commerce unprotected, their grievances unredreffed, military and mercantile affociations began every where to be formed; and in a fhort time, to the aftonishment of the world, and army of fifty thousand volunteers, as if by magic, was created, disciplined, and equipped; and resolutions almost universally passed against the use of British manufactures.

The English Ministers, whose sears and apprehensions on this occasion happily supplied their deficiency in justice and liberality, instead of opposing this national rage, furnished the new raised army with arms from the royal magazines; and thus gave a fanction to a measure which had been adopted without any regard to their consent or approbation. The Irish Parliament met on the 12th of October, and to the usual address brought forward by the courtiers, an amendment was moved, and adopted by a great majority, to infert in the body of the address the following words—"We beg leave humbly to represent to your Majesty, that it is not by temporary expedients, but by a FREE TRADE, that this nation is now to be faved from impending ruin." In this the Lords concurred, and the addresses were carried up to the Lord Lieutenant with great parade amidst the acclamations of the people—the Duke of Leinster, who commanded the Dublin volunteers, escorting the Speaker in person, while the streets were lined with the different military companies on both sides from the Parliament House to the Castle.

The thanks of both Houses were unanimously voted to the volunteer corps throughout the king-dom, for their patriotic exertions; and a fix months Money Bill passed the Commons, in order to prevent a sudden prorogation.

Before we investigate the consequences of this new and alarming spirit, it may be proper to notice a farther occasion of misunderstanding between the Courts of London and the Hague, from an encounter which took place in the course of the present summer between Sir Richard Pearson of the Serapis man of war, accompanied by the Scarborough frigate, having under their convoy the trade from the Baltic, and Captain Paul Jones, an adventurer of desperate fortune and desperate courage, who was commander of a small American fguadron, which had for some time past infested the British seas. After a very fierce and bloody action, both the Scrapis and Scarborough, the convoy being first secured, were compelled to strike their colors, and were carried by the captors to the Texel. On this a very strong memorial was prefented to the States General by Sir Joseph Yorke, who urged in the most preffing terms, "that those ships and their crews may be stopped and delivered up, which the pirate Paul Jones, who is a rebel fubject, and a criminal of the state, has taken." But their High Mightinesses answered, "that they will in no respect whatever pretend to judge of the legality or illegality of the actions of those who have on the open seas taken any vessels which do not belong to this country, and bring them into any ports of the Republic; and that they are not authorized to pass judgment either on those prizes, or on the person of Paul Jones." This was an anfwer hard of digestion to the English Court, and which indeed clearly indicated the partiality of the Republic to the cause of America; but the quarrel between the two countries, though evidently growing more and more ferious, was not yet fufficiently matured for an actual rupture.

Very early intelligence of the war with France having been fent by express over land to India, the city of Pondicherry was invested by the troops of the Company and of the Government, in the autumn of the present year; and, after a gallant resistance by M. de Bellecombe, the Governor, it surrendered to the arms of his Britannic Majesty. On the other hand, the settlement of Senegal, and the British forts on the river Gambia, were captured by a French squadron under M. de Lauzun.

ADDENDUM,

Note, p. 73, line 6.

To the infolence and adulation of Lord SANDWICH'S rhetoric on this occasion, history affords perhaps no juster parallel than the speech of Mardonius to Xerxes on his projected invasion of Greece, as recorded by the pen of Herodotus. "Sir," faid the flave to the despot, "you are not only the most illustrious of all the Persians who have hitherto appeared, but you may fecurely defy the competition of posterity. You are entitled to our particular admiration for not fuffering the people of IONIA, contemptible as they are, to INSULT US with impunity. It would indeed be preposterous, if, after reducing to our power the Sacz, the Indians, the Ethiopians, and the Affyrians, with many other great and illustrious nations, we should not inflict vengeance on those GREEKS, who without provocation have molested us. There can be nothing to excite our alarm-no multitude of troopsno extraordinary wealth—their PROWESS I myfelf have known— Besides this, I am informed that in all their military undertakings the Greeks betray the extremest ignorance and folly. Who, Sir, shall oppose you at the head of the forces and fleets of Asia? The Greeks I think never can be fo audacious. If, however, I should be deceived, and they shall be so man as to engage us, they they will foon find to their cost that in the art of war we are the first of mankind." How well the predictions of these vain boasters were verified let SALAMIS and SARATOGA tell! The abject manner in which the GREAT KING subsequently sued by his Ambassadors for peace, courting with fawning slattery the friendship and alliance of the very people he had thus injuriously treated, and the disdainful refusal of the Athenians to enter into any negotiation fo long as the Perfian army remained within the limits of the Grecian territory, are particularly related by the fame historian, "You may be affured," fay these sons of freedom, that your endeavours to perfuade us into an alliance with the BARBARIANS never will succeed. On the part of the Athenians, we declare, that as long as the fun shall continue his ordinary courfe, fo long will we avoid any friendship with Xerxesfo long will we continue to refift him. Hereafter do not prefume to enter an Athenian affembly with overtures of this kind." Herod. book viii. fect. q. It is curious to remark, that the Laureat Whitehead, in his New Year's Ode for 1774, has converted this historic parallel into a poetic contrast-with what color of plaufibility a short extract will suffice to show.

"Pass but a few short sleeting years,"
Imperial XERXES sighed, and said,
And all that pomp which now appears

A glorious living fcene Shall breathe its laft.'2

True, tyrant!—wherefore then does pride
And vain ambition urge thy mind
To fpread thy needless conquests wide,
And desolate mankind?

Not so do BRITAIN'S KINGS behold
Their floating bulwarks of the main
Their undulating fails unfold,
And gather all the winds aerial reign
To hurl JUST THUNDERS ON INSULTING FOES,
TO GUARD and not INVADE the WORLD'S REPOSE.
